A Scotch-Irish Manoeuvre

By J. C. Plummer

(Copyright, by Daily Story Pub. Co.)

Beginning at the forecastle hatch a procession made its way slowly towards the quarter deck on the break of which two figures stood with expressions of grim resolve on their countenances.

The foremost figure of the procession—McGunn, bore in his hands a wooden vessel styled the kid from which the foremast hands ate their food. Behind him, stolid and solemn, stalked Patrick Doody, and behind him came the remainder of the crew, seven in all.

There was a solemnity about the figures and their gait that, had they been appropriately draped, one might have fancied a group of ancient Greeks were intending the offering of a sacrifice to their tutelary god.

When the poop had been reached by McGunn he held out the kid and spoke. "This meat is na' feet for a Chrestian man to eat. It stinks," addressing his words to the skipper.

The mate opened his mouth to emit a denunciatory flood, but the skipper dammed the stream with a motion of his hand. He took the kid, poked the meat with the iron spoon and then sniffed it. He bravely concealed any impression made by the unsavory odor.

"You say this meat tastes and smells bad?" said the skipper, with a sarcastic inflection of tone.

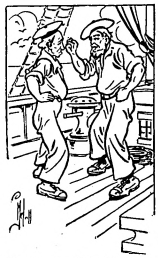
"I na said it smelt bad," replied McGunn, heatedly, "I said it stunk. I'll na modeefy my words."

"Stink's the worrud," put in Doody, firmly.

The skipper beckoned to the cook, who came slowly aft.

"Do you smell anything wrong about this meat?" he demanded.

The cook was an undersized man with a bad leg and a pock-marked face.



"It's the Intimate Acquaintance of That You'll Make Whin We're Ashore."

In his skull, however, was some gray matter. If he decided in favor of the men the officers would make life a long purgatory to him. If he cast his lot with the quarter-deck he knew that contumely and perhaps bodily injury awaited him from the crew.

"I can't taste and I can't smell," he cried desperately.

The skipper sneered and the sailors laughed derisively.

"It's na eemportant if he can smell or no," said McGunn, "the meat is na feet for a dog."

"And what are you but dogs?" thundered the skipper, "a lazy set of cogers with nothing else to do but grumble about your food. Get forrard all of you."

When a man asks amelioration of his condition from a despot and it is refused he had better submit, otherwise the last state of that man may be worse than the first. McGunn, an old seaman, counseled submission. Mutiny is not a profitable enterprise on the part of a crew and a Scotsman is thrifty.

The ship was bound from Liverpool to Colombo, but she was to stop at Mauritius and discharge a part of the 'tween deck cargo. When she arrived at Port Louis she lay in the stream and no one was allowed ashore, the cargo being discharged into lighters.

"I've a schame," whispered Doody into the large ear of McGunn.

The two men were on the forecastle, their companions being below. The skipper and chief mate were ashore and the second officer had taken advantage of their absence to pay his respects to a bottle of whisky at which he had been casting longing eyes during the voyage. He was sitting stupidly on the cabin house.

"I'll na be the waur for hearing of it," replied McGunn, cautiously. "The cargo is about all out of the 'twane decks," continued Doody, still in a whisper, "and this evening I crawled aft to the pantry. There are two lockers, one on the port and one on the starboard side. Both are divided in the middle. In the part forninst the cabin is the cabin sthores, mate swate as a nut and biscuits crisp as a Tipperary barley bun—"

"Ye never tasted a Dundee bannock," put in McGunn.

"Blissed be God I haven't, but niver mind. In the forrard compartment is the cabin end, but only a wee bit left of the crew's."

"Weel, and what of it?" asked McGunn coldly.

"Before we've been two wakes at say the cook 'll have to break into the starboard locker for the crew's food, for what's in the port locker 'll be gone. Now, here's my schame. We'll drop into the tween decks to-night while the skipper and mate, devil fly away wid 'em both, are ashore and the sicond mate's drowsy drunk. Thin we'll change the sthores in the starboard locker from the forrard to the after compartments. Thin, unbeknowingst to the skipper we'll be atin cabin grub and shmacking our lips."

"Mon," exclaimed McGunn, "but they'll find it out."

"They can't find it out for two wakes at laste, for there's enough cabin shtuff in the port locker to last that long."

"Ferry guid, ye're the farst Irishman I've met that had any brains."

"Faith, if the world daypended on Scotland for its brains there'd be none at all, at all."

McGunn passed the reflection. "When shall we go about it?" he asked.

"In two hours it'll be the right shade o' darkness and the cook'll be aslape. I'll take a nap till then and you wake me."

McGunn sat on the break of the forecastle. His two companions of the anchor watch were disputing over something at the knightheads, the cook was snoring in the galley door and the second mate was nodding on the poop.

"Ef there should be trouble," mused McGunn, "I'll na have that Irishman a wetness against me. I'll do it meself."

Stooping close to the rail he stealthily walked to the main hatchway, on which the hatch was simply laid. He pushed it softly aside and dropped into the 'tween decks. In a half hour he emerged, pushed back the hatch and walked softly forward. The two men were still talking on the forecastle and did not notice him.

When the watch went below he passed Doody coming on deck.

"You didn't wake me," complained the Irishman in a whisper.

"It's na safe. I'll have nothing to do wi' it. Lave it alone, Doody, it'll make trouble," whispered McGunn, in reply.

"He can't say but I was against him doing it," chuckled McGunn as he fell asleep. "My skarts 'll be guid and clear."

"Mane coward," muttered Doody as he reached the deck. "He's afraid to go wid me list I might blab. Dhirty spalpeen."

The absent officers had not returned. The ship was in darkness and the watch, profiting by the absence of the officers and the condition of the second mate, promptly lay down on deck and slept.

"It's betther that McGunn won't know it was done. He might till on me if it was found out, and I won't ate carrion."

He crawled aft to the hatchway, slipped the hatch aside and dropped below.

Amid the bustle of weighing anchor, making sail and battening down the hatch McGunn whispered to Doody:

"I'm ferry glad we did na' attempt that fule scheme."

"Yis," replied Doody, "it's betther as it is."

But the food did not improve. It was as bad as ever and a light dawned on McGunn.

"Ye bloondering fule," he snarled at Doody, "after I had told ye not to do the thing you went down and changed the stuff back again."

"You herring gutted lubber," groaned Doody, "why didn't you whusper me you had already changed the shtoff?"

"I'll settle with ye when we get ashore," gritted McGunn.

Doody waved a huge freckled fist under McGunn's nose.

"It's the intimate acquaintance of that you'll make whin we're ashore."

But when they were very drunk at Colombo they forgot that episode, among other things, and were close friends.

Felt Impelled to Forge.

"I couldn't help it, Fred. I just couldn't help it."

This was the only defense that pretty Eugenia Adelaide Hill, the daughter of a retired banker of Paterson, N. J., offered to her husband when confronted by him with the evidence that she had forged his name to checks and cashed them for her own use, in supreme court in the decree annulling her marriage to Fred Rowland Hill of Paterson.

The action of the court was the tragic denouement of Hill's romance with his bride of 15 months, whom he courted as a Sunday school teacher in the Episcopal church at Paterson, but who he afterward learned had served a term in a reformatory for the same offense.

The court annulled the marriage on the ground that Mrs. Hill "was not a responsible person of good reputation and concealed this fact from her husband."

What Dead Reckoning Means.

Dead reckoning is a term used in navigation to express the estimation that is made of a ship's place without having recourse to observation of the celestial bodies. It is made by observing the way she makes by the log and the course on which she has been steered, making allowance for drift, leeway, etc.

CATCHER MYERS OF GIANTS IS REAL FIND

Catcher Jack Myers of the Giants has proved one of the real baseball finds of 1909. Any youngster who can break into fast company and show the way to veterans in hitting, after the pitchers have had plenty of occasion to study his weaknesses must pack the right sort of goods. Yet the case of Myers is of added interest in that the big fellow is an Indian.

Myers is, of course, an assumed name, a college bequest to mark the good natured aborigine from the sequestered people of his tribe. At the Pala reservation, in California, the notable backstop is known to the Mission Indians as "Tortes." A strictly English interpretation of the word is beyond even the educated ingenuity of Myers himself. It is a fusion of the Spanish-Indian dialect, and conveys about the same sense of meaning as our slang "hot stuff."

Myers is not a reservation Indian, though much of his time has been spent on the California reserves. Until the social barriers had been somewhat removed by the refinement of university education he naturally sought the life of his instincts. A born athlete, he still preserves a deep veneration for the pursuits of his forefathers. Already he is counting the days until he is free to return to the hunting grounds of his valley home.

Raised at Riverside, Cal., Myers had every advantage of securing an education. As a boy he played with his little white brothers of the town. He just naturally took to baseball, and as he was always big and strong, he accepted but one position on the field, that of catcher. From the sand lots he drifted to high school ball. Then he came east to study at Dartmouth. A year in college and Harrisburg, of the Tri-State league, persuaded him to seek the diamond as a vocation. He drifted west to Butte, Mont., of the Northwestern league, and made such a hit there that St. Paul, of the American association, procured him almost two years ago. From St. Paul he went to the Giants.

WOULD ENLARGE NATIONAL COMMISSION MEMBERSHIP

President Murphy Believes Supreme Baseball Body Should Include Minor Representation.

President Murphy of the Chicago Cubs has some ideas regarding the government of baseball that he hopes to see carried out before another year is over. He believes the membership of the national commission should be enlarged and that the minor leagues should have representation on the ruling body.

"Baseball is a big thing," said he recently; "a much bigger thing than it was six years ago, when the national commission came into existence. I believe the present members of the body work as hard as they can, but I believe there ought to be four more members and that the minors ought to have some voice in the rulings handed down.

"It seems to me it would be a good thing to have the presidents of both major leagues and the presidents of class AA minor organizations on the commission. I think Powers, O'Brien and Sexton ought to have voices in the highest court of organized baseball, and I would suggest that President Johnson and C. W. Somers of the American league and President Heydler and Garry Herrmann of the National be the other four members.

"Furthermore, I belive that all the meetings of the commission ought to be open to the public, and that a ball player who has or thinks he has a grievance should be allowed to appear before the commission or be represented by an advocate for the purpose of having his case stated properly.

"I don't think the major leagues have any right to keep the minors off the ruling board, and I am backed up in this opinion by some of the most experienced men in baseball, John T. Brush among others. Baseball has grown wonderfully in the last six years, and there is no reason to believe it will not grow just as much more in the next six. I think we ought to prepare for the growth to come by making the national commission a truly representative body."

Spiked Ball Nets Four Bases.

A riot was precipitated in a Philadelphia championship ball game the other day when a ball stuck on the spike of the fence and the umpire called it a home run. The rules provided that a ball over the fence was a two-bagger. The police were called to suppress the fans, while three fielders made frantic efforts to clamber up and release the tempting ball. But there it stuck, just beyond their reach, and they had to wait until it could be knocked off with a club. It was the only ball in the grounds.

MATHEWSON'S IDEAS ON PITCHING IN BIG LEAGUE

"The proportions of qualities needed for good pitching are about as follows: Fifty per cent. control, 30 per cent. luck, ten per cent. speed, ten per cent. curve.

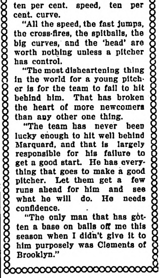
"All the speed, the fast jumps, the cross-fires, the spitballs, the big curves, and the 'head' are worth nothing unless a pitcher has control.

"The most disheartening thing in the world for a young pitcher is for the team to fail to hit behind him. That has broken the heart of more newcomers than any other one thing.

"The team has never been lucky enough to hit well behind Marquard, and that is largely responsible for his failure to get a good start. He has everything that goes to make a good pitcher. Let them get a few runs ahead for him and see what he will do. He needs confidence.

"The only man that has gotten a base on balls off me this season when I didn't give it to him purposely was Clements of Brooklyn."

OUT OF GAME FOR SEASON



Larry McLean, catcher for the Cincinnati baseball club, whose knee cap was broken several days ago, submitted to an operation in a hospital the other day. The physicians say the operation was successful, but that McLean will not be able to play again this season.

VALUE PAINTED ON.

Well painted is value added whether the house be built for one thousand dollars or ten thousand. Well painted means higher selling value, and higher occupying value—for there's an additional pleasure in living in the house that is well dressed.

National Lead Company assist in making the right use of the right paint by sending free upon request to all who ask for it, their "Houseowners' Painting Outfit No. 49." This outfit includes a book of color schemes for either exterior or interior painting, a book of specifications and an instrument for detecting adulteration in paint materials. Address National Lead Company, 1902 Trinity Building, New York City, and the outfit will be promptly sent to you.

BABY HORRIBLY BURNED.

By Boiling Grease—Skin All Came Off One Side of Face and Head—Thought Her Disfigured for Life.

Used Cuticura: No Scar Left.

"My baby was sitting beside the fender and we were preparing the breakfast when the frying-pan full of boiling grease was upset and it went all over one side of her face and head. Some one wiped the scald with a towel, pulling the entire skin off. We took her to a doctor. He tended her a week and gave me some stuff to put on. But it all festered and I thought the baby was disfigured for life. I used about three boxes of Cuticura Ointment and it was wonderful how it healed. In about five weeks it was better and there wasn't a mark to tell where the scald had been. Her skin is just like velvet. Mrs. Hare, 1, Henry St., South Shields, Durham, England, March 22, 1908."

Enough Till Eternity.

The biggest marble quarry in operation in the world lies almost within a stone's throw of the heart of West Rutland, Vt. Around its mouth is a stock of 12,000 pieces of finished marble. There is a great gap in the hillside. The marble crops out as bare of soil or vegetation as a billiard ball. You can walk over that hill and never step on anything but marble, and after two score years of blasting and drilling they don't know how deep the deposit lies. It seems there's enough marble in that one hill for an eternity.

No Man is Stronger Than His Stomach

A strong man is strong all over. No man can be strong who is suffering from weak stomach with its consequent indigestion, or from some other disease of the stomach and its associated organs, which impairs digestion and nutrition. For when the stomach is weak or diseased there is a loss of the nutrition contained in food, which is the source of all physical strength. When a man "doesn't feel just right," when he doesn't sleep well, has an uncomfortable feeling in the stomach after eating, is languid, nervous, irritable and despondent, he is losing the nutrition needed to make strength.

Such a man should use Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It cures diseases of the stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition. It enriches the blood, invigorates the liver, strengthens the kidneys, nourishes the nerves, and so GIVES HEALTH AND STRENGTH TO THE WHOLE BODY.

You can't afford to accept a secret nostrum as a substitute for this non-alcoholic medicine OF KNOWN COMPOSITION, not even though the urgent dealer may thereby make a little bigger profit. Ingredients printed on wrapper.

Duluth GRAIN COMMISSION Minneapolis

GEO. SOMERVILLE IS SHOT DOWN

FORMER STATE SENATOR PROBABLY FATALLY WOUNDED BY ANGRY CLIENT.

IN HIS OFFICE AT SLEEPY EYE

Trouble Over Land Deal Prompted Act.—Assailant Fails in Attempt to End His Own Life on the Spot.

Sleepy Eye.—Hon. George W. Somerville, a former state senator, was shot twice by John S. Hayner, in his private office on the principal street here.

The first shot passed through his left forearm and entered his side under his arm pit. The other passed entirely through his body from chest to his back, piercing his lungs.

Little Hope of Recovery.

Physicians in attendance hold out but little hope for his recovery. A hurry up call for the Drs. Mayo of Rochester was sent and one of the brothers reached Mr. Somerville's side in a few hours. The utmost will be done to save the patient, but it is realized his case is desperate.

Mr. Somerville's assailant fired a third shot, intending to take his own life. He might have been successful in this, had not the city's marshal, attracted by the reports of the first two explosions, entered the place on a run and struck the man's arm as he held the revolver to his head. The bullet passed a few inches from the man's head and entered the ceiling of the consultation room in which the men had been standing.

The assassin had no chance to escape and apparently had planned none, even though he was prepared to shoot the former senator. The weapon was taken from him and later he told the officers his name was John S. Hayner.

Hayner was immediately taken by automobile to the county seat at New Ulm and placed in jail in the care of the sheriff.

Assassin Gives His Version.

Trouble in the settlement of a deal over property was the motive for the shooting. Hayner believed he had been deceived by the former senator. The only statement he has made since the shooting was secured soon after he had been taken to New Ulm. He said:

"I worked for several years for the Cuddy-Cavanaugh Company, which has been digging ditches in Brown county under contracts. I have had headquarters at Sleepy Eye and New Ulm and have known Somerville a long time. A business building at Sleepy Eye came into my possession some time ago, and I was induced by Somerville to trade it for some land which he said he owned in Missouri.

"I found this land, upon investigation, to be valueless, and appealed to Somerville to square the matter. We had some correspondence, but finally he refused to reply to my letters.

"I then determined to have a personal interview with him and to get some satisfaction if possible. I was armed when I entered his office, but was hardly expecting an encounter.

"I had no sooner spoken about the land than Somerville ordered me to leave. When I showed no intention of doing so he picked up a heavy ruler which was on his desk, as if he proposed to drive me out.

"I was crazy mad by this time and began to shoot, not caring what became of either of us. I felt that I had been swindled and badly treated all around."

Hayner is about 35 years of age. He says his name is John S. Hayner and that his home is in St. Paul.

George W. Somerville is one of the best-known lawyers in the state of Minnesota. He has been active in politics and was a candidate for the republican nomination for governor in 1906, when he retired from the state senate after serving eight years.

New Ulm, Minnesota.—John S. Hayner, assailant of former State Senator Somerville of Sleepy Eye, cheated the ends of justice.

Making a rope from the blanket and other bedclothing in his cell at the county jail, he placed the end around his neck and attached the other to the iron fixtures of his cell door. When Deputy Sheriff Charles Brust went to the cell to bring his breakfast, Hayner's body was found hanging. It was cold and the man must have been dead several hours.

The sheriff and other officers kept the company of the prisoner until midnight, and the sheriff inclined to the opinion that a guard ought to be maintained through the entire night. The county attorney did not coincide with him in this belief, with the result that Hayner was left unattended.

REPORTS ADVERSELY ON CANAL.

Superior-to-Mississippi-River Project Considered Unfeasible by Fitch.

Stillwater, Minn.—A letter from the United States engineer's office at Duluth says that Graham E. Fitch, colonel of the corps of engineers, has reported adversely on the proposition of constructing a canal between Lake Superior and the Mississippi river. This is in accordance with the resolution approved by congress on March 3, 1909.

WIDOWER KILLS CHILDREN.

Fires His Farm House and Then Hangs Himself.

Redwood Falls.—William Tibbitts, a farmer who lived near Delhi in this county, killed two young girls, one his own daughter. Then, after making an unsuccessful attempt to burn his farmhouse and cremate their bodies, he hurried to his barn, and hanged himself.

The victims of the supposed maniac were his 10-year-old daughter and Cecile Norton, about 18 years of age, daughter of his housekeeper, Mrs. Rose Norton. More lives might have been sacrificed, but for the fact that Mrs. Norton, who has been employed by Tibbitts since the death of his wife two months ago, was visiting at her former home at St. Paul Park, Minn. With her were the two youngest daughters of Tibbitts.

The hapless victims of the farmer were slain with a heavy piece of iron, either an iron stake or a long tooth from some farm machine. No one so far as known saw the killing. The girls could have had no chance at all for their lives. Everything indicates that their slayer struck them from behind and crushed their skulls at the first blow. Many blows from the deadly weapon then followed, their heads and upper portions of their bodies being cut and bruised in a horrible manner.

The girls were killed either in the house or just outside the door. Their bodies were found under some hay in the house. Tibbitts had taken hay from the barn and covered the corpses, then setting fire to it. His little boy saw the smoke rushing from the building and summoned the neighbors, who arrived just in time to save the building and preserve the bodies of the dead girls from cremation.

It was when the neighbors were bending their energies to extinguish the flames that Tibbits ran to the barn and completed the day's tragedies.

Tibbits was about 70 years of age and was well thought of in this community. The sheriff and county attorney have started a thorough investigation.

The coroner's jury called to investigate the triple tragedy returned a verdict that Cecile Norton and Dorothy Tibbetts came to their death by the hand of William Tibbetts, and that the latter committed suicide by hanging. No motive was assigned for the double killing and suicide. Neighbors say the man had been unbalanced mentally some time.

THROW BABES IN WELL.

Barnum Woman Burns Barn and Tries to Burn House.

Barnum.—Mrs. Fred Young, aged 22, wife of a farmer residing about five miles southeast of here, while her husband was on his way to town with a load of cream and milk, threw her three children, aged one, three and five years, into a deep well, set fire to the barn, destroying it, and also set fire to the house.

Failing in her effort to burn the building, she took a dose of paris green and then gashed her throat several times with a knife, making ugly wounds, but failing to sever the jugular vein.

Mrs. Young was taken to the sheriff's residence at Carlton and a special meeting of the insanity board was held at once. The woman was found to be insane and ordered committed to the state insane asylum, in case she recovers. In the meantime, she was ordered taken to a hospital at Cloquet. Her condition is serious. The physicians, however, believe that she may recover.

Mrs. Young has been in poor health for the past two years and it is said she had threatened several times to kill her children and herself. Her father committed suicide several years ago.

EX-MAYOR OF DULUTH IS DEAD.

John Drew, Aged Pioneer, Passes Away at Ninety-two.

Duluth.—John Drew, twice mayor of Duluth, and one of the oldest residents here, died suddenly of old age.

Mr. Drew was 92 years of age last April. He was born in Reding, Conn., about 40 miles from New York City, in 1817. He came to Duluth in 1869, when the town was first started. He served two terms as mayor, the first in 1874-5, and the second in 1879-80.

He has lived here all of the 40 years since he first came to the city, and before his years made him helpless was one of the best known figures on the city streets. For a time Mr. Drew was one of a group of five or six men who handled nearly all of the business of northern Minnesota, and he was intimately identified with building up this section of the country. He is thought to have ben the oldest resident of the city.

Mr. Drew leaves a wife, Mrs. Emma H. Drew, now in Portland, with her daughter, Alice, for her health, and two sons, Charles M. Drew, employed in the city engineer's office, and John R. Drew, of Cleveland.

Engineer White Pinned Under His Engine.

Detroit.—The North Coast Limited was in a head-on collision with a moving gravel train at the west end of the Detroit yards, while running at full speed.

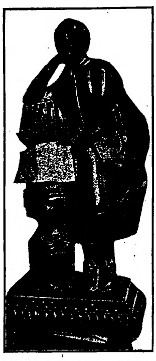
Engineer White, of the passenger train, was missing and his body was found later under his engine, which was thrown almost bottom side up in a ditch

BUST OF SHAKESPEARE SOLD

Wooden Likeness of the Bard of Avon Brings $2,025 at Recent Auction in London.

London.—Here is an illustration of the bust of Shakespeare which was sold at Sotheby's recently for $2,025: Between the time of the discovery of the bust and its sale many persons had gained the idea that it was to go for much more money than it brought. The bust, however, has no great artistic value, according to what has been said of it in the English prints; it is unflattering to Shakespeare and its chief value is as a relic only.

Its authenticity, however, appears to be quite fully attested. It is believed to be the work of Gerard Johnson, who erected in the church at Stratford on Avon the portrait bust to which this bears a strong resemblance. It resembles markedly also the Droeshout print which was used as frontispiece to the First Folio edition of Shakespeare's works.



Only Known Contemporary Likeness of Shakespeare.

It is put down as work of the late sixteenth or early seventeenth century, and it served as the model on which Kent and Scheemakers designed their Shakespeare monument for the Poets' Corner of Westminster abbey. The statuette is about fifteen inches high and in good preservation except for some wormholes and a crack in the base.

The history of it as given dates from the life of the poet's sister, Joan Shakespeare, and it remained in the family until Thomas Hart, the fifth in direct line of descent from Joan, directed a relative, Thomas Hornby, to rent Shakespeare's birthplace and exhibit this bust and other relics there. There the bust continued on exhibition until 1820, when Mr. Hornby's widow left the house owing to an increase in the rent. She took it to a house across the way, where it was shown for some time longer.

In 1830 the executors of Thomas Hornby sold it to Miss Craven of Bath, an eccentric collector, who died not long ago at an advanced age. It was found on her death in a store cupboard, wrapped in paper, where it had lain a long time forgotten. It passed on her death to the ownership of Hugh Baker, who caused its sale at Sotheby's. It is carved of mulberry wood.

HEROIC SAILOR SAVED

Sprang Overboard to Get Help for Shipwrecked Mates and Nearly Perished.

New York.—After 26 hours of wild battling with the sea, alone on a drifting, wave-swept raft, Madden Persson, the sailor of the Arlington, which went ashore in the storm off Long Beach, has been saved. He was landed in this city by the schooner Irene and Mary, which docked at the foot of Beekman street.

Persson is the sailor who sprang overboard in an attempt to reach shore to get help for his shipmates and who was borne to sea on a hatch cover and had been given up as lost.

Drifting ten miles off Atlantic Hills he saw the sails of the Irene and Mary and managed to signal the ship. A boat was lowered and he was rescued.

Although Persson was attired only in a pair of canvas pants and an undershirt, he was none the worse for his long exposure to the gale and cold when they got him aboard the Irene and Mary. He drank six cups of coffee, ate four meals in one, borrowed a clay pipe, smoked it and then fell asleep.

Locks Fail to Keep Death Out.

Latrobe, Pa.—Following the death of her aged husband, John Gardner, a civil war veteran, Mrs. Gardner has lost her reason, refusing to admit anyone to her home near Lagonier, and having interfered with the funeral and burial. She was alone with her husband when he died, and, possessed with an idea that she could protect herself from the entrance of death, she barricaded the house. She fastened the windows, drew down the shades, bolted and locked the doors and piled furniture against them and then lighted lamps.

White Steamers Use Kerosene as Fuel

THE WHITE STEAMER WHICH MADE A SUCCESSFUL PUBLIC DEMONSTRATION OF KEROSENE AS FUEL ON THE RECENT 2650-MILE GLIDDEN TOUR.

The most interesting announcement ever made in connection with the automobile industry was undoubtedly that made a month or two ago to the effect that the new models of the White Steam Cars could be run on kerosene, or coal oil, instead of gasoline. Everyone at once recognized that the use of the new fuel would add materially to the advantages which the White already possessed over other types of cars. There were some people, however, who were sceptical as to whether or not the new fuel could be used with complete success, and, therefore, the makers of the White Car, the White Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, determined to make a public demonstration of the new fuel in the 1909 Glidden Tour.

From the standpoint of the public, no test more satisfactory could have been selected. First of all, the distance covered on the Glidden Tour, from Detroit to Denver and thence to Kansas City, was 2650 miles. This was certainly more than sufficient to bring out any weaknesses, if such had existed. Still more important was the fact that the car was at all times while on the road under the supervision of observers named by those who entered other contesting cars. Therefore, it would have been impossible for the driver of the White to have even tightened a bolt without the fact being noted and a penalty inflicted. At night the cars were guarded by Pinkerton detectives and could not be approached by any one.

The complete success of the new fuel while on the 2650-mile public test and the advantages gained through its use were well described in the following dispatch which the correspondent of the New York Sun sent to his paper at the conclusion of the tour:

"A feature of the tour which was watched with special interest was that the White Steamer used kerosene, or 'coal oil,' as fuel instead of gasoline. The new fuel worked splendidly throughout the 2650-mile journey, and all claims made in its behalf were fully proven. First of all, as regards cheapness, the White driver secured kerosene all along the route from 6 cents to 10 cents cheaper per gallon than was paid for gasoline. Secondly, the new fuel was handled without any precautions, and it was not unusual to see kerosene being poured into the fuel tank while the crew of the car and an interested crowd stood by with lighted cigars and cigarettes. At the finish of the tour, the White was the only car permitted by the authorities to enter Convention Hall, where the technical examination took place, without draining its fuel tank. Thirdly, the new fuel proved to be absolutely without smoke or smell. Fourthly, kerosene could be purchased at whatever part of the route was most convenient, and not once during the trip through the ten States of the Middle West was there found a grocery store where kerosene was not readily and cheaply obtainable. Finally, the amount of fuel used on the trip showed that kerosene is at least fifteen per cent. more efficient, gallon for gallon, than gasoline. The car in other respects made a most creditable showing, and there was the usual rivalry among the observers to be assigned to the White so that they could ride with the maximum of comfort. The only adjustments or repairs charged against the car during the long trip were tightening a lubricator pipe and wiring a damaged mud guard. These penalties were not inflicted until more than 2000 miles had been completed with an absolutely perfect score."

A particularly interesting feature of the new White Steamer is that either kerosene or gasoline may be used as fuel. The necessary adjustments so that the fuel may be changed from kerosene to gasoline, or vice versa, may be made in a couple of minutes; but so completely successful has kerosene proved to be, that it is not believed that any purchasers will care to use gasoline.

The White Company report that the demand for their new steam cars—both the $2000-model and the $4000-model—exceed their most sanguine expectations. It is evident that the combination of steam—the power which everyone understands and has confidence in—with kerosene—the fuel which everyone has on hand and can handle without any danger—is thoroughly appreciated by up-to-date purchasers of automobiles.

WOULD GET WEALTH QUICKLY

Farmer Had Nothing But Contempt for the Moderation of the Street Magician.

A patent medicine salesman upon the streets of a small Maine village was giving a free sleight-of-hand performance in order to collect a crowd. Presently he took a handkerchief from his pocket, held it by one extreme corner, shook it, tossed it into the air, caught it in his hand and took from it a 25-cent piece.

"There," he remarked, "you see I take this quarter from the handkerchief, although you saw for yourself that the handkerchief was empty. I can get another this way," he added, and apparently plucked one from the air.

"Gosh!" an old farmer in the little audience muttered; "that feller must not keer much fer money. If I could do a thing like that, you bet I wouldn't stick at quarters—I'd take a half dollar every time!"—Exchange.

FERTILE FARMS FOR THOUSANDS

AT THE OPENING OF THE STANDING ROCK AND CHEYENNE RIVER INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Registration at Mobridge, Lemmon or Aberdeen, S. D., October 4 to 23.

The opening of the Standing Rock and Cheyenne River Indian Reservations in South Dakota and North Dakota in October will give thousands of people 160 acres of fertile farming lands for a small sum per acre.

If you intend to engage in farming or are now farming and wish to change your location, why not register for one of these farms? It costs nothing to register.

Aberdeen, South Dakota, on the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, and Mobridge and Lemmon, South Dakota, on the Chicago, Milwaukee & Puget Sound Railway, are points of registration. You can register any day from October 4 to 23. The drawing will take place at Aberdeen on October 26.

This land opening will also give you a splendid opportunity to see the wonderful country opened through the construction of the new line to the Pacific Coast, at small additional cost over your railroad fare to points of registration.

Folders regarding this land opening and the country along the new line in South Dakota, North Dakota and Montana, free. F. A. Miller, General Passenger Agent, Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Ry., Chicago, Illinois.

CHICAGO'S BOMB MYSTERIES

BY SAMUEL H. PIERCE

ACTING CHIEF OF POLICE SCHUETTLER

FRED A. BUSSE, MAYOR OF CHICAGO

"HELLO! Is this the City Press association of Chicago? Well, I've just touched off another one at No. 261 Wabash avenue. There's a gambling place on the fourth floor there. Listen, and you'll hear the building go up, about ten minutes from now."

Boom! went the explosion, on time to the very minute—so close to the time the newspaper men received the telephone message as to prove that the mysterious dynamiter had worked with a time fuse. The building, a five story brick, at the precise address given was almost entirely wrecked. As usual, the police denied that any gambling had been going on there, but a bridge whist layout in one room, a lot of racing "dope" and all that goes to equip a poolroom and bookmaking establishment in another—all this on the fatal fourth floor—proved that the bomb-planter's tip was reliable, as it had been scores of times before.

The above reads like the opening of a first-class mystery story, or Conan Doyle detective novelette, does it not? But it is no such thing. On the contrary, it is the literal and serious transcript of an almost every day incident of real life in Chicago since the bomb-throwing reign of terror began, now two years ago.

More bombs have been exploded in Chicago during these two years of Mayor Busse's administration than in ten years of St. Petersburg and Moscow combined.

Yet the bomb-thrower still goes free. Nobody has ever been convicted of any of these dynamite outrages, now numbering nearly a hundred. Not a single arrest was made until the state authorities took up the matter. Three men were rounded up on suspicion, and released upon their readily establishing alibis.

The blasts are attended with greater property loss than were caused by the anarchist riots in 1886, or in the times when Lucy Parsons and the other radical agitators were said to hold secret sway. Five hundred buildings have been wrecked by 33 large dynamite bombs, the first of which was exploded soon after Mayor Busse took office and the word went out that Chicago was to be an open town. Great gaps have been torn through the brick and stone walls in the loop district—the heart of the city—by the terrific force of the explosions, and streets spattered with brick, stones, glass and timbers hurled from the bombarded buildings are becoming common sights in the western metropolis. Scores of people have been seriously, some fatally injured. Many more are nervous wrecks.

The great significant fact is that nearly all of these bombs have been aimed directly at gambling houses or at property owned by or closely associated with notorious gamblers or gambling institutions. Many gambling hells have been blown up with dynamite, and many more have gone out of business through fear that the bomb's lightning might strike them next.

There is not a district of the city that has not known the destructiveness of the explosions. There is scarcely an inhabitant of Chicago who is not familiar with the loud, hard, reverberating detonation peculiar to the explosion of a dynamite bomb.

On the night following the day on which Chicagoans read of the anniversary celebration in Rome of the Haymarket riots in Chicago, a bomb was exploded and another gambling house was blown to perdition, with great destruction of surrounding property.

It used to be that the mayor and the chief of police would give out statements to the effect that there was not a gambling house running within the city limits of Chicago. But these statements have been entirely discontinued. They were as a red flag to the bomb-thrower. Every time one of them was issued the loud voice of a bomb would answer: "Here is one," and the shattered remains of roulette wheels, poker tables smashed to splinters, cards, chips and other gambling paraphernalia strewn throughout the wreckage of the building gave bountiful evidence that the bomb spoke truly.

The explosions are always in the nighttime, when few people are on the streets, and in every way the bomb-thrower seems to use exceeding care to avoid inflicting personal injury. Despite these precautions, however, the hospital lists of the "injured by bomb explosions" are assuming formidable proportions, and one or two deaths may result from the injuries thus far inflicted. More than 100 persons were injured in the explosion in the rear of the Title and Trust building, one perhaps fatally. Eight suffered serious injuries from the blowing up of the Manning & Bowes saloon and gambling house at 321 State street.

POST CARD SENT BY THE DYNAMITER

Probably the most remarkable feature of the outrages is the daring displayed by the bomb-thrower. He sends the newspapers warnings and comments on the explosions; he makes a practice of telephoning the City Press association, a news-gathering agency maintained by the different Chicago newspapers, giving notice that fuses have been lit and telling the place where a bomb is about to explode. His method of calling up the newspapers to tip off his explosions and his anonymous letters giving the careful details of his plans, serve as drum and cymbals to advertise the helplessness of the police and to spread consternation throughout the present administration, from the mayor down. The letters are all written in the same handwriting, and never yet have his tips failed to prove true.

In one of the latest of these tips the bomb-thrower promises a "double-header" for the next explosion. He says:

"The next one will be a double-header, and will be close enough for the chief and his boss to hear it sputter. They know where the layouts are, and it will be dead easy for them to guess where the next noises are coming from. Many more to follow unless the solid lid is put on. The gang must close—double dose next. Some poor bartender may get pinched for the job, but wrong one again. Will have him in 24 hours—Nit."

This note was received the day after the police had promised to have the bomb-thrower captured in the next 24 hours. It was written on a postal card. On the address side of the postal this derisive statement appeared:

"Why don't Shippy hire some tin stars from Indianapolis?"

This letter is in direct line with another which ran:

"It is highly amusing and ricidulous to see by the different papers that 'touch' No. 31 was caused by labor troubles. Did labor troubles cause the other 30 'touches?' Were the places touched off scenes of labor strikes, or owned by people antagonistic to labor unions? Look at the list. Where is the big clearing-house? Do the papers know? Is it near the scene of No. 31?

"Who controls gambling in Chicago? A combination controlled by one man, who caused No. 31 to be touched off, who has monopolized the handbook game and put out of business hundreds of men that have been in the business all their lives. Can you blame them for throwing bombs?

"One man has leased the service wire and has whipped every one into line, so that if you don't send your bets to him you can get no service, and if you try to run independent the 'dicks' raid your place, while his places run unmolested. In other words—do business with that man or quit. Can you blame the people he put out of business? When that combination is broken up the bombs will cease, and not until then.

"FROM ONE WHO KNOWS.

"P. S.—The next one that cackles, that man will hear personally."

The Chicago outrages are not confined to bomb-throwing, but include incendiary fires, wrecking by improvised battering-rams, cutting of telephone cables and numerous other acts of vandalism. They began with the blowing up of the residence of John Hill, Jr., at the time he was fighting racetrack gambling around Chicago, and resulted in putting out of business all the racetracks, many of the grandstands having been burned to the ground. The Chicago Telephone Company, which furnishes wires to the Tennes syndicate of poolrooms, has been a heavy loser from the series of explosions. Telephones and switchboards are part of the equipment of the handbooks and poolrooms.

On the night before the great annual orgy known as the First Ward ball, a bomb exploded in front of the Coliseum, as if to say to every respectable resident in Chicago: "Here is where every law of decency and every city ordinance for the suppression of vice in Chicago will be openly violated tomorrow night, through the political immunity enjoyed by Alderman John Coughlin (Bath-House John) and Alderman Michael Kenna (Hinky Dink), the two aldermen of the First ward, comprising Chicago's notorious "Red Light District." But for the enormous political pull enjoyed by these two aldermen, this bomb would have caused the suppression of the Coliseum orgy. As it was, however, 15,000 people, mostly gamblers and denizens of the under world, women in tights and all manner of suggestive costumes, and men who own and frequent the First ward resorts, crowded to the great building and drank and caroused all night. Daylight revealed a scene of drunken men and frazzled women lying about on floors strewn with champagne bottles and fragments of costumes, wigs and ornaments torn away in the wild revels of the night.

WRECK OF A SALOON

It was the explosion at State and Congress streets, known as Touch No. 30, partially wrecking the recruiting station, which started the government forces on the track of the dynamiter. This explosion was in a hotel district; men and women came rushing from their rooms in the Auditorium and Annex, the Elk hotel and the five or six other hostelries of lesser fame in the immediate vicinity. On the southeast corner of State and Congress streets, and on the opposite side of Congress street, the plate glass windows in the store of Siegel, Cooper & Company were shattered.

Two days later, while the police were still searching for the thrower of bomb No. 30, bomb No. 31 exploded in the heart of the downtown district, wrecked the rear of the Chicago Title & Trust building, a skyscraper at No. 100 Washington street, and damaged every structure in the block bounded by Washington, Clark, Madison and Dearborn streets, and also the Boston Store, which is bounded by Madison, Dearborn and State streets. This explosion took place on Sunday night at 11:20 o'clock. It was louder and sharper than a thunderbolt, and was heard all over the loop district. Pedestrians were showered with glass, which came pouring down from the windows of the buildings for blocks around, and men, women and children were hurled to the ground.

Almost before the building had ceased rocking under the strain 100 girls in the exchange directly over the wrecked part, cut and bleeding from flying glass, ran through the clouds of smoke and soot toward exits. Many of the girls fainted. Some had to be carried from the building. This bomb is said to have contained at least 25 pounds of dynamite.

The blast came from a manhole over a conduit in Calhoun place, familiarly known as "Gamblers' alley." It is in the rear of the four-story annex of the Chicago Title & Trust Company. Here the "Central" and "Randolph" exchanges of the Chicago Telephone Company are located.

Fifty cables, lying in the telephone company's wrecked conduit, were stripped, broken and twisted into knots, with the result that 25,000 telephones in the downtown district were put out of business.

Through the four-story building at No. 111 Madison street the explosion swept like wind, the force taking everything before it. The headquarters of "Mont" Tennes, king of the gambling clique that is now in power, was on the second floor of this building, just above the place where the fuse had been ignited.

This was Tennes' clearing house and the place from which all his syndicate business was conducted. During the administration of Mayor Dunne, Tennes had been forced to move out, but after the election of Mayor Busse he moved back again and established a clearing house close to his old quarters, where he previously had a system of spies and guards who defied the police.

And in all the series of outrages no arrests were made until the state of Illinois came to the city's aid. The United States government also has taken a hand.

The few arrests that have been made all came to nothing. Those made by the police seem to have been purely superficial.

Who is the mysterious bomb thrower? This is the question of the hour in Chicago.

Some say he is a fanatic reformer who has adopted this method of suppressing the gambling in the city.

Some believe his identity will be discovered in a man made reckless by despondency over the loss of his fortune in the gambling houses who has dedicated his life to the work of revenge.

Some theorize that he is a vindictive dope fiend suffering from a real or fancied wrong—a man whose sense of cunning has attained abnormal development from the use of the drug at the expense of his other senses, including regard for morality, law or right of property.

It is probable that there is no other city in America where gambling dens are frequented by women so extensively as in Chicago. They are regular patrons of the Chicago gambling places in the basements along South Clark street, where the mysterious forms of Chinese gambling are indulged in. Not only do they patronize the regular poolrooms, but there are poolrooms and euchre resorts for the exclusive patronage of women. Several of the feminine gambling houses have been raided by the police. One of the most recent was a woman's poolroom, where handbooks were being made on the races at Hamilton and Sheepshead Bay. The place was conducted by "Ted" Nevlin, a young man who is not on the inside of the gambling ring. The dope sheets and lists of patrons presented to the court during the trial of Nevlin showed that the women placed their bets under such names as Tillie, Eva, Mollie, Lillian, Nellie and initials, such as M. B. R., etc. Some of these are known to be prominent women of Chicago, but only the proprietors of the game were taken in the raid.

The Chicago newspapers have done everything but print the names of those whom they believe to be back of the bomb throwing. But the parties so pointedly indicated walk the streets every day with impunity, and seem to have no fear of the police.

The Chicago Daily News in a recent issue says:

"The man who heads the conspiracy to commit bomb outrages is a former safe blower. He has enjoyed immunity for years in certain quarters and is now a man of wealth. This man lives with his family in Chicago, and walks its streets daily, as does the man he has been employing recently to explode the dynamite—another "peter man," as the "regular" safe blowers are called, in distinction from the "yeggmen" or tramp safe blowers. Others who have been aids in his operations include a man who was once a constable and two other men involved in sensational crimes in Chicago. It was discovered that these men began their operations as a result of the bribery to dynamite Hill's house. The amount paid was $200."

HUNTING LIONS IN AFRICA

THE DEAD LION

PLAYFUL PASSENGERS

I had been out all the morning looking for tracks of lion, with no result, and on arrival at camp I was greeted with the news that a lioness had killed a big goat before sunset the previous day while the goats were out grazing I had lunch, and was doubtful whether to go or not, as it seemed a very poor chance so late in the day. Elme, my Somali, had been taken ill, so I had no shikari. However, B., who had very kindly foregone the opportunity of going for her himself, lent me Hald, and off we went about two miles, where we found the horns and one or two small pieces of goat. Hald quickly got on to the track, which he followed at the rate of four miles an hour, until we got into a valley next beyond one in which B. had got a big lion a few days before, which we believe was the father of the cubs Getting on to stony ground made things more difficult, but he still followed the tracks at a good pace, and we went some way along a small nullah until Hald began to think we might be near. So he and I went forward while the others went up the nullah. However, the track kept to the side of the nullah, and we presently got to a part where the nullah divided and thick bushes grew all round. Here we walked about searching for the track. Presently we heard a whistle, so Hald and I rushed round to where Syce was standing with rather a scared face, pointing to the bushes close beside him. Just then I saw the lioness slinking between the bushes about 80 yards off, and, as she was disappearing, I had a snap shot. There was a growl, and the beast jumped into the air and immediately disappeared. We ran, Hald telling me to make a detour so as to come on the beast from an unexpected quarter; but it had gone on, and we soon got on to a pronounced blood track, which took us some way, then turned back at an acute angle more than once. It was now dusk, and the tracks had taken us back to the spot where I had first shot. So Hald, vowing that the beast must be severely wounded or it would have gone further, said we must give it up and return the next day, when we should certainly find the beast dead. So confident was he that the men sang their triumphal lion song all the way back, which, of course, had the effect of bringing out the entire camp, which was a case of counting chickens before they were hatched.

Next day we were off again in good time, and on getting near the place came right on to fresh tracks. At first I thought it was a different lion and that we should find the other dead; but this soon proved not to be the case, as we found blood. The tracks were only visible here and there and appeared to lead uphill towards the valley where B. had shot a lion. However, we searched about the bushes with rifles at the ready for some time, until we heard a honey-bird chattering lustily in the nullah. These honey-birds come and call to guide a man to where there is a bees' nest, in the hopes that the man will get at the honey which they themselves cannot get at. But they also have a way of calling men if they see a lion or a snake. Hald took it as a good indication; so we left the bushes and followed the bird up the hill to the top, where it appeared to have nothing more to show. Finding no tracks Hald decided on a search down below where we had previously been; but to cut a long story short, after two hours' search we found that the bird had been quite correct, and we took up the track again at a point just beyond where we had left it. Another three hours was spent looking for the tracks over in the next valley, the men being divided into three parties. Ultimately Hald pointed me out a smudge in the graved soil which he said was the lioness. Although I had done a good deal of tracking, I could see no shape at all; but on inspection we found, some twenty yards further back, an undoubted track on some softer ground. This led us into a flat place with clumps of dense bush intersected by bare ground; any of these clumps might have held an army of lions. This was the most critical part. The lioness was wounded, and we did not know how badly. She might have sprung on us from any of these dense bushes and, in fact, the tracks in one place led around into a bush we had already passed. Luckily, she had gone on. A long wait ensued while the men were gathered in and given instructions. Hald and I then crept noiselessly round to a fairly open space at right angles to the direction of the track, while another man was sent forward to a large ant-heap to mark. Presently Hald whispered: "There she is; shoot!" and I could see a dark-colored beast threading its way slowly through the bushes, heading straight toward us and about thirty-five yards off. As I put up my rifle it saw us and turned back. I shot and hit it behind the shoulder, the bullet lodging in front of the chest.

We were at once in hot pursuit, though I was delayed and actually prevented from having a second shot by a cartridge jamming. The lioness was soon found in a dense bush dead. She was hauled out and photographed. On cutting her open we found she was full of milk, so we decided to go the next day and see if there were any cubs about.

Three of them were found in a crevasse near the spot where the lioness had been killed the previous day. They were the size of half-grown cats and looked half asleep, and not at all resentful. They were rather dull, sleepy little beasts for the first week or two, but woke up when feeding time came. We kept three goats for them, who showed little objection, except when the latter dug their claws in.

They commenced teething a week after we got them, and when the canines began to appear they suffered considerably, one in particular getting quite cantankerous. They traveled each day on a fast mule, a camel being too apt to jolt and a donkey not fast enough. On arrival at camp and at the midday halt they got a drink from the goats, which traveled along, keeping pace with the mule all the way. We were making for the coast by Abyssinia, and reached Harrar when they were about three weeks old. Here they had the run of our bedrooms in an old Arab house, and occasionally got outside on the veranda, one distinguishing itself by falling down into the yard below, a feat which had absolutely no ill effects. They loved the early morning sun, but by 7:30 it was already too hot and they craved for shade.

Last year Great Britain sold $200,000,000 worth of coal to foreign nations.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Distillery Operated by Uncle Sam

UNCLE SAM'S PRIVATE STOCK WHISKEY

WASHINGTON.—Within gunshot of the White House and the Capitol the federal government has itself been operating a distillery. The distillation plant was not conceived with a view of evading the internal revenue laws, yet there was no special tax issued for its operation. The output has not been of the regulation "moonshine" character, and there was no effort at concealment, though the approach to the plant located in the rear of 1358 B Street Southwest would indicate such. The undertaking has not been one for profit, but for scientific research. Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, chief of the bureau of chemistry, department of agriculture, has been the chief distiller, and he is going to publish to the world the results of his experience; a demonstration of the methods of making, the sources, and the uses of denatured alcohol.

During the operation of the distillation plant a course of lectures was given to representatives from all agricultural colleges of the country and from the various state experiment stations. In this course every matter connected with the practical operation of a distillery; the growth of the banana and its uses; the use of molasses; the possibilities of the cactus; the production and chemistry of malt, and the technique of making—the principles, theory, and conduct of fermentation, including proper temperature, density, principle, and products formed—the denaturing of alcohol and denaturants, and the use of denatured alcohol for manufacture and medicines—was discussed by officials of the bureau of chemistry. The object in view, directly, has been to determine by practical demonstration the value of the various farm products as alcohol producers—to determine the feasibility of the farmers utilising by-products and unmarketable fruits and vegetables in the production of denatured alcohol.

A feature of the report of Dr. Wiley will be a discussion of the practicability of individual farmers distilling their own products at a profit; likewise the feasibility of co-operative distillation plants in thickly settled communities.

Ames Will Probably Want an Airship

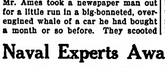
IT is predicted at Washington that the first man to buy a Wright aeroplane after they are put on the market, as undoubtedly will be the case before very long, will be Representative Butler Ames of Massachusetts. Mr. Ames is an enthusiastic automobilist and has always had the speed bug! He is wealthy, can gratify every inclination and desire along that line and is generally supposed by his colleagues to buy about two cars a week. One automobile man says it is only necessary to assure Mr. Ames that there is a new automobile out that will beat everything else that ever burned gasoline and he will buy it.

One day last spring, when there wasn't much doing around the capitol, Mr. Ames took a newspaper man out for a little run in a big-bonneted, over-engined whale of a car he had bought a month or so before. They scooted around town on the low gear, and finally started up the Conduit road toward Cabin John bridge. Marshal Collins being temporarily disconnected from the sweet little suburb of Glen Echo, the Massachusetts congressman, who was acting as his own chauffeur, kept throwing in a little more gasoline and a little more spark and speeding a little faster every minute. Finally the newspaper man got scared to death, and hung on with hands and feet. He nearly dropped dead when Mr. Ames turned around and yelled at him, above the noise of the car: "I wish we had a good straight stretch of road, so we could go a little bit fast. We are not going much more than 50 miles an hour, and this car is guaranteed for 85."

They do say that when the pair of them landed back in town the newspaper man was in a near-faint and had to be revived with three drinks, all in a row.

So those members of the house who know Mr. Ames' propensities say that he is just waiting for the chance to buy the first Wright areoplane put on the market in order that he may make an intellectual effort to break his cultured neck.

Naval Experts Awaiting Monster Gun



NAVAL experts at Washington are awaiting with impatience the completion of the 14-inch gun now under construction by the Midvale Steel Works. The gun will be shipped to the Washington navy yard where the finishing touches are to be added and will be proof-fired at Indian Head about the middle of October.

It will be the first high-power gun of this caliber ever constructed for practical purposes and will fire a shell weighing 1,000 pounds.

The navy will beat out the army in this respect, as the latter also has three 14-inch modern guns now under way which will fire a shell of about 1,400 pounds.

Other nations have built 16-inch muzzle-loading guns, but not of very high power.

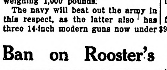
Plans are being worked out at the navy department for the four submarines authorized by congress. Proposals will be asked for construction soon.

These and the fleet collier, also authorized by congress, comprise the ship work still remaining to be contracted for by the naval establishment under increases in the navy already provided for.

There are many features of submarine construction which the experts are closely studying and the delay in contracting for these vessels is due to the effort to obtain the very latest improvements.

Congress appropriated $2,000,000 for the building of these ships and $900,000 for the collier.

Ban on Rooster's Crow at Capital



THE new chicken and pigeon ordinance recently promulgated at Washinton will be rigidly enforced by the health department of that city. In squares with more than 75 per cent. of the property improved permits will be necessary.

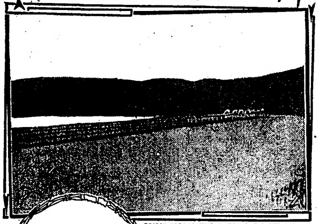
While it will be necessary to have a permit to keep chickens, it will require the special consideration and approval of neighbors to keep a chanticleer. Before he is allowed to bestir the neighborhood in the morning with his vocal serenades, his owner must have the consent of the householders in the neighborhood, especially those who object to his being used as a rising alarm.

Persons desiring to keep fowls within the fire limits of the district must file an application with the health office, setting forth the lot number, square number, and the street number of the premises where it is desired to keep the chickens or pigeons. No provisions are made for ducks or geese.

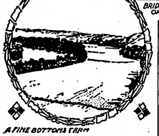
Chanticleers will have full sway outside the fire limits, according to the regulations. The same will be the case within the fire limits where the property improved is less than 75 per cent. The regulations, in substance, are as follows:

"No chickens are to be kept within the fire limits without a permit from the health department, and then not within 25 feet of any structure owned by any person other than the applicant, and used for human habitation, occupation or assembly. Outside the fire limits, fowls or pigeons cannot be kept within 50 feet of any structure aforesaid, subject however, to the exceptions set forth in paragraph four. No fowls shall be permitted to run, fly or stray within 50 feet of any such structure."

DOWN ALONG THE ARKANSAS



BRIDGE ACROSS THE RIVER NEAR CLEVELAND, OKLAHOMA



A FINE BOTTOMS FARM

Rivers are great studies. They are as changeable as a woman, yet ever keep in the same general course. Confined within certain limits with moods that vary, they wander on, obedient to the laws that hold them to their course. They are sometimes tempestuous and careless as men, wiping out at one sweep the farms that have claimed their ancient channels and asserting once again the full sweep of their individuality. Sometimes they sleep the peaceful repose of a babe At other times they burn away and leave but the bed, from which the fevered waters rise again to commence the elemental cycle of vapor, cloud, rain, rivulet and river. And each of these rivers has its own individuality. Some are long; some large; some deep; some shallow; some quiet; some turbulent.

The Arkansas is not long enough to be classed among the longest rivers of the world, though among the tributaries to the Father of Waters it is second only to the Missouri. It is not large and does not spread out the accumulated waters in wide sheets; yet at times, when the Aztec rain gods pour out a deluge and the lower courses are fed by the inflowing creeks and rivers, its magnitude is majestic, inspiring, destructive. Nor is the channel deep. For the mountain pebbles and the rich, red sand and the plain white sand and all other varieties of sand from the mountains to the gulf are constantly filling in, scooping out, rolling and gliding down the swift current, piling in bars, building up islands or leveling the inequalities of the bed. And the flow is strong; the sweep of the waters is a mighty power, unharnessed, to go on, ever, to the sea.

Whether at the snow peaked springs where it rises in the Rockies and goes dashing down the mountain defiles, whether fretting its way between the man-built walls through the city of Pueblo or gliding through the pebbly foothills, whether winding its silvery way across the Colorado and the Kansas plains or gliding on between the Oklahoma bluffs and hills, whether watering the mistletoe bedecked elms or the canebrakes in the state whose name it bears, the Arkansas has a beauty, a charm, that makes one love to dwell thereon. Anywhere along its course its acquaintance may be made—a sort of chance acquaintance—and one feels a nobler, wider sentiment, like that which comes from the contact with a broad, free-minded man.

However, since it cannot be considered as a whole, let the acquaintance be narrowed to that beautiful sweep of the stream flowing between the Osage reservation and Pawnee county, Okla., where on one side or the other, and sometimes both, farms have been hewn from the wooded valleys; where the sandstone bluffs rise, sometimes 50, sometimes 100 feet, with niches where the great horned owl, the peregrine falcon and the huge turkey vulture find a nesting site, and where, in olden days, the eagles reared their young. Here the red waters hurry down, down, down, with a swish that mingles with the rustle of the leaves, the shrill of insects and the cries of birds, in one sweet symphony that drowns the troubles, the stress of life, and gives new vigor to the one who can separate himself from his business or his strife, as he learns new things first hand from God's great book.

Here along the bottom roads the great cottonwoods rise, with massive pillars that reach up and up, over a hundred feet, just right for a giant's walking stick. Great pecan trees, huge burr oaks, walnuts, hickories and three or four smaller varieties of oak, black, white, red and chinquapin, are here. Then there are great hackberries with the corrugated and winged bark, and here is that beautiful black coated member of the rose family which has been designated by the natives as the shittim wood of the Sacred Book. The wood is hard, the hardest of the forest trees, with the possible exception of the persimmon; but the persimmon seldom gets beyond the bush size, though there are some large trees. Here, underneath the taller growth, are the black haw bushes, while growing out of the bluffs are Juneberries, both prizes for boys, but insipid to a mature appetite. And along close to the stream are the few remaining cedars which were uncut by telephone polers before the land was open to settlement.

To climb among the bluffs, to inspect holes left by disintegrated fossil trees; to listen to the tufted titmouse's golden call; to see the "mountain boomer" scamper along to the sheltering rocks, where he leaves his tail in plain view and, doubling back, pokes out his head to see where the danger lies; to look at the ferns clinging to the rock, is rejuvenating, inspiring, life giving. There are at least seven varieties of ferns. The abrupt perpendicular walls clothed with the resurrection fern are passed by unheeded when the heat dries up the fronds brown and inconspicuous like the hands of a paralytic; but the rains come and the face of the bluff is spotted with great dark green patches where the mass of separate fronds blend in green drapery. And there, on the north side of a huge, wet rock, is the walking leaf, camptosorus chizophillus, the slender, leaf-like frond, a drawn-out arrow head, whose long whip cracker end takes root in the moss and liverworts and starts a new plant. Of the spleenworts there are two species; one small, growing out on the under side of cool, wet overhanging rocks; another, tall and slender, living more in the open. And, clinging to the side of the canyon, are ferns a foot or more high and subdivided—a sort of magnified edition—varying, however, from the two smaller species that can be found growing all about the woods. The most singular, however, is the very small, dwarfed one on the edge of lime rocks—frond and all but a couple of inches long with wiry stems like the maiden hair, which spring back and forth with their sprawling, scattered double compound frondlets an eighth of an inch long, dark green above and white underneath, with whole masses growing from a perfect nest of fine, black rootlets imbedded in the cracks of the rocks.

From the bluffs one can look out across the tree tops to the other side, where the Osage hills, wave upon wave, reach as far as the eye can see, with here and there a deadening, where the leaves of the girdled trees make a brown patch on the landscape. Fields freshly plowed or covered with corn and cotton stretch away in the valleys, while the nearby hills still bear the scattered growth of oaks and hickories. And far, far away the bold prairie expanse, with here and there a clump of trees to break the contour, can be seen indistinct in the distance. And the river banks, with fringes of willow, the white cottonwood limbs, the glistening bars, and the water ever gliding on and on.

Keep Interested in Something.

Many old men break down and become childlike because they abandon business, and thus lose much of their every-day interest in the world around them. It is not uncommon for old people to take up courses of study and successfully pass through them. All such occupations serve to keep the interest alive in something besides mere selfishness, and do more toward warding off "the blues" than all the medicine in the drug stores.

A CHANCE FOR THE HAGUE.

The Hague International Court of Arbitration is fooling away its time with nothing to do, when a great lot of disputes might satisfactorily occupy its attention. There is the trouble between Bolivia and Peru, for instance, which certainly admits of settlement by arbitration. Bolivia has no seacoast and is anxious to reach the ocean. That country casts longing eyes on Peru's riparian boundary, and there are those who fear that she seeks a pretext to go to war with that country and seize a maritime province, or else exact one as an indemnity. The attitude of Chile in this case is watched with solicitude, for if the latter country should lend assistance to Bolivia Peru would probably have to submit. The only ground for dispute at present appears to be alleged dissatisfaction of Bolivia over the Argentine award, which was favorable to Peru, but as this was the result of arbitration it is too small an affair to go to war about. Bolivia would lay herself open to severe condemnation if she began hostilities on a trumped-up cause, but considerations of this character have not always deterred Spanish-American republics from seeking their own ends.

The enormous sums accumulated in the savings banks of the country—institutions organized for that purpose exclusively—does not, after all, represent all the accumulations of the people. The report from the comptroller of the currency at Washington shows that the savings deposits in the national banks, many of which encourage thrift by inviting persons to place small amounts in their keeping, paying interest thereon, amount to $380,494,000. Surely this is a very tidy sum, and added to the billions in the savings banks shows that the economical and saving have a very sizable and satisfactory financial anchor to the windward in the event of a storm approaching.

They are digging away at the Panama canal and the officers report that the amount of excavation is now equal to that made during the entire French administration. In addition a great deal of other work has been done, while the sanitary conditions assured by the thorough advance preparations, though they have taken much time, have proved life savers. There are still 100,000,000 cubic yards of earth and rock to be removed, but Col. Goethals reiterates the declaration that the canal will be ready for use in 1915. There is no doubt that the commerce of the world is eagerly awaiting the finish.

It seems useless to preach caution about swimming, bathing and rowing in the hot weather, yet a little precaution about going in the water overheated or under other conditions which invite danger would give the desired watery pleasure without its being taken at the risk of a watery grave. It is well to remember always that water is the most treacherous of the elements, as it allures, while the dangers of the others are plainly apparent.

A man in Wisconsin has such a passion for hard manual labor that to gratify it he has forsaken a lucrative law practice. It is significant of this type of desire that his friends think his mind unbalanced. Were the world generally subject to this desire for hard work, life would be halcyonic in its contentment, and a certain gentleman, proverbial for looking after the lazy contingent, would have to go out of business.

Kansas City, Mo., is to have a $20,000,000 railroad station. It is not many generations ago that Kansas City was merely a stopping place on the trails and stage routes that led to the great west. But both Kansas City and the great west have been going some in the meantime.

Possibly in the fullness of time chauffeurs who attempt to drive across railway crossings in advance of a train will learn that it merely means more business for the gravedigger.

New Jersey is determined not to waste its natural resources. The constable in a little town in the state punishes hoboes by chaining them in the streets. The mosquitoes do the rest.

MINNESOTA STATE FAIR

PIONEER DAY ATTRACTS ANOTHER BIG CROWD AT HAMLINE.

ATTENDANCE RECORDS BROKEN

Early Settlers in State Hosts of the Board of Managers of Minnesota's Great Annual Exposition.

Hamline.—Thursday, generally a busy day at Minnesota state fairs, brought out nearly 25,000 people.

The total figures for the day, however, probably will reach 45,000. At 9 a. m., 4,818 persons had passed the turnstile as against 5,586 for last year and 4,752 for 1907.

The younger generation has been temporarily swept from prominence, giving way to the territorial pioneers who held their annual reunion. The association's commodious log cabin was filed with the "old boys" who turned out to exchange reminences.

Gates Receipts to Date.

The total gate receipts for the first three days of the 1909 state fair, as given by the fair's treasurer, are $94,062.65. For Monday, the receipts were $52,483.55; Tuesday, $22,283.14; Wednesday, $19,192.96.

Total receipts for the corresponding three days in 1908, when the fair made a profit for the week of $80,000 were $87,038.45. The receipts each day were: Monday, $19,433.95; Tuesday, $32,296,45; Wednesday, $35,308.05.

Minneapolis, Minn.—The annual reunion of the association of the Minnesota Civil War Veterans was held on the state fair grounds, where the fair is in progress. The old soldiers met at the Administration building at two o'clock and marched thru the grounds, led by a band and the Morgan G. A. R. drum corps of Minneapolis. After the regular business of the meeting they were addressed by B. F. Nelson, president of the Minnesota State Agricultural society.

Red River Boats Carry Grain.

Thief River Falls.—The unusually heavy crop of grain on the farms east of this city on the Red Lake reservation, which was opened to settlement five years ago, will require the services of all the freight boats on the Red Lake river to carry it to this city. Light-draft boats have made regular schedules on the 100 miles from this city to the great Red lakes, but the largest vessel, one built and owned by the farmers for their own convenience exclusively, has been out of commission this season, until the rains of August.

Wants Gas Plant Franchise.

Brainerd.—Capitalist Frank Farnum, a former resident of Brainerd, now of St. Paul, presented a request to the city council for a franchise for a gas plant in this city. He asked for an exclusive franchise for twenty-five years, and the matter was referred to a committee consisting of one from each ward. As the majority of the council were elected as municipal ownership men, the probability is against the granting of the franchise.

DARES SISTER TO SHOOT; DEAD.

Boy, Aged 8, Living Near Bagley, Minn., Is Accidentally Killed.

Duluth, Minn.—Playfully daring his 14-year-old sister to shoot when she pointed a gun at him cost Elling Gulbranson, aged 8, his life. He lies at his home near Bagley, Minn., with the top of his head shot off. The children were playing with a double-barreled shotgun which neither supposed to be loaded. His sister is prostrated over the tragedy.

DR. EGGE SLAIN AT MOORHEAD.

Unknown Man Jumps From Behind Tree and Takes Physician's Life.

Moorhead, Minnesota.—Thrond E. Egge, one of the leading physicians of this city, was murdered by an unknown person within 100 feet of his own home. His head was beaten out of all resemblance of its original form by his assailant.

Dr. Egge, had been making a profesional call on his bicycle and when approaching his residence the murderer jumped from behind a tree and began to attack, according to A. J. Wright, a merchant of the city who happened to be in the vicinity and witnessed the greater part of the tragedy. The man had a club in his hand when he rushed to the street, and on this account it is believed that the murder had been carefully planned. The physician was knocked to the street with a heavy blow and numerous others were dealt him after he had fallen.

When the murderer left the body, Mr. Wright noticed that he still carried the club and struck trees and posts with it as he ran away in the darkness. His peculiar actions at this time has led many to think that the murder was performed by a lunatic, although there is no theory as to whom he can be. Dr. Egge was one of the most popular men in the city, and no one can recall that he had a single enemy. The man who caused his death made no attempt to rob the physician either before or after he was dead.

Moorhead, Minn.—When the murder of Dr. T. S. Egge was reported, the police at once swore in deputies who searched the neighborhood, and at 2 a. m. Frank Keathman was arrested at his home in Fargo. Keathman, who is a carpenter, was in bed at the time, and is reported to have been under the influence of liquor. In his clothes $7 or $8 was found. Keathman, up to the present time, has remained silent and has refused to make any statement.

The weapon with which Dr. Egge was killed was the kingbolt of a wagon, belonging to John Lamb, a fuel man. It had been returned after the crime, and is covered with human hair and human blood. It is reported that an old row had existed between Egge and Keathman for several years.

SENT ON GOOD ROADS JAUNT.

George W. Cooley Sent Abroad for Two Months' Trip.

Minneapolis.—George W. Cooley, engineer and secretary of the highway commission will inspect European roads as an official agent of Minnesota. At a meeting of the state highway commission, Mr. Cooley was instructed to make a two months' visit to Europe in the quest of road information.

The meeting was atended by all the commissioners, Chairman Louis W. Hill, Clarence J. McNair and Timothy O'Conner, and the action instructing Mr. Cooley was unanimous.

The decision of the commission to send a representative to Europe marks an epoch in the history of Minnesota road building, as it is the forerunner of a state-wide campaign for good roads, backed by the state highway commission and helped along by automobile clubs and civic organizations generally. Members of the commission said that the next legislature would be asked to aid the movement by large appropriations, and that the highway commission would enlist the county commissioners of every county of Minnesota.

BANK ROBBED OF $2,000.

Robbers Blow Safe at Foxhome and Escape on a Handcar.

Fergus Falls.—Robbers looted the State bank at Foxhome, fifteen miles west of here. They blew the safe and secured $2,000. They then escaped on a handcar, going over to Breckenridge, ten miles west, where they threw the car into the river. It is supposed that they have escaped into North Dakota.

LOW COLONIST FARES TO THE WEST AND NORTHWEST.

Union Pacific Passenger Department announces that Colonist Fares will be in effect from Sept. 15 to Oct. 15, 1909, to all points in the West and Northwest.

This year the West looks more promising than ever. Now is the time to secure land at low prices, and, at the same time, to visit the many interesting points in the West and Northwest, at which liberal stopover arrangements may be made.

A better estimate of raw lands can be made now than formerly, because these lands are in proximity to new farms that are producing wonderful crops.

Mottoes of a Queen.

Her majesty, the queen of Portugal, pins her faith, it is said, to the following mottoes:

Keep out of doors all you can. Breathe outdoor air, live in it, revel in it. Don't shut yourself up. Build your houses so that the air supply is good. Throw away your portieres and bric-a-brac. Don't have useless trifles about you.

Have a favorite form of exercise and make the most of it. Ride on horseback if you can; cycle if you cannot get a horse; do anything to get out in the open air.

Don't overeat. Drink little and let that little be pure. Don't try to dress too much, yet dress as well as you are able. Wear everything you can to make yourself lovely.

A TEXAS CLERGYMAN

Rev. G. M. Gray, Baptist clergyman, of Whitesboro, Tex., says: "Four years ago I suffered misery with lumbago. Every movement was one of pain. Although I do not like to have my name used publicly, I make an exception in this case, so that other sufferers from kidney trouble may profit by my experience."

"This is where you get off," said the railroad conductor.

"But I haven't rid fur enough," said the Billville man.

"Can't help that. You can't go any further on this ticket."

"My friend," said the man, "it's the furst time I ever rid on a railroad train, an' ef you ain't a better man than what I am I'm a-goin' to set right here till I see whar the road ends. I know it must end some're, an' I'm curious to see whar. Here's one more dollar. Now, go 'long an' let me alone!"

Why We Are Stronger.

The old Greeks and Romans were great admirers of health and strength; their pictures and statuary made the muscles of the men stand out like cords.

As a matter of fact we have athletes and strong men—men fed on fine strength making food such as Quaker Oats—that would win in any contest with the old Roman or Greek champions.

It's a matter of food. The finest food for making strength of bone, muscle and nerve is fine oatmeal. Quaker Oats is the best because it is pure, no husks or stems or black specks. Farmers' wives are finding that by feeding the farm hands plentifully on Quaker Oats they get the best results in work and economy. If you are convenient to the store, buy the regular size packages; if not near the store buy the large size family package. 2

So, What's the Use?

"Yes, I went fishing yesterday," began the man who tries to be original. "Luck? Well, some. I caught two fish. One was three and a half inches long and the other two inches."

But was he believed? Not much. After he passed on some one commented:

"Bet he didn't get a bite."

Singular and Plural.

"Whenever she gets to thinking how much they're in debt it affects her nerves." "Huh! the way it affects her husband is singular." "How singular?" "Just singular, it affects his 'nerve.' He tried to borrow a hundred from me to-day."—Catholic Standard and Times.

Ask Her This Question

"Do you know of any woman who ever received any benefit from taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound?"

If any woman who is suffering with any ailment peculiar to her sex will ask her neighbors this question, she will be surprised at the result. There is hardly a community in this country where women cannot be found who have been restored to health by this famous old remedy, made exclusively from a simple formula of roots and herbs.

During the past 30 years we have published thousands of letters from these grateful women who have been cured by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and never in all that time have we published a testimonial without the writer's special permission. Never have we knowingly published a testimonial that was not truthful and genuine. Here is one just received a few days ago. If anyone doubts that this is a true and honest statement of a woman's experience with Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound write and ask her.

Houston, Texas.—"When I first began taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound I was a total wreck. I had been sick for three years with female troubles, chronic dyspepsia, and a liver trouble. I had tried several doctor's medicines, but nothing did me any good.

"For three years I lived on medicines and thought I would never get well, when I read an advertisment of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and was advised to try it.

"My husband got me one bottle of the Compound, and it did me so much good I continued its use. I am now a well woman and enjoy the best of health.

"I advise all women suffering from such troubles to give Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a trial. They won't regret it, for it will surely cure you."—Mrs. Bessie L. Hicks, 819 Cleveland St., Houston.

Any woman who is sick and suffering is foolish surely not to give such a medicine as this a trial. Why should it not do her as much good as it did Mrs. Hicks.

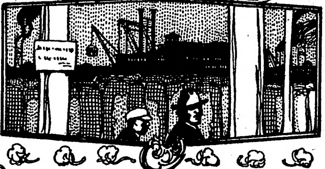
KING COTTON'S IMPOVERISHED RETINUE

BY DANIEL J. SULLY

Editor's Note.—Daniel J. Sully, the author of this article depicting the possibilities of cotton, the pitiful vassalage of the planter and the destiny awaiting the United States and the cotton grower, when we take advantage of our opportunity, has had a remarkable career in the record and romance of cotton. It was his unparalleled market campaign that caused cotton to rise to 17¾ cents a pound in 1903, the highest point reached since the civil war. During this actual reign of cotton, when Sully was its premier, $450,000,000 in gold was brought to this country and formed the substructure of the enormous bull market which culminated in the spring of 1907. Then the south and the whole nation realized for the first time that the success of cotton and the advancement of civilization go hand in hand.



AMERICAN cotton-planters, proprietors of the greatest gold-producing staple in the world, are poor. They are in practical servitude. It is a tragedy of contemporary life that they who produce for the world the commodity without which modern civilization and industrial life could not proceed are themselves absolutely subservient and the poorest paid toilers in the United States. Intellectually the cotton-growers are surrounded and coerced by factors which have no other purpose than to keep them in this benighted vassalage. From this condition influences of a new American spirit must liberate them.

We smile at the Celestial shivering in the midst of coal-fields larger than the state of Pennsylvania. America's attitude toward cotton is almost equally grotesque. On the southern rim of the United States, within an area of practically 14 states, is grown 80 per cent. of the world's supply of cotton. The remaining 20 per cent., grown in South America, India, and the far east, is of an inferior quality and cannot compete with the cotton grown in the United States. Notwithstanding this enormous advantage, the fact still remains that this heaven-sent boon, paradoxical though it may seem, does not enrich, but rather impoverishes, the southland.

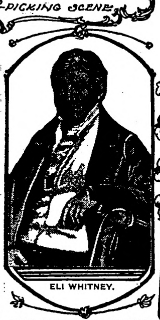
TYPICAL COTTON-PICKING SCENE

This is a tale of commercial ineptitude. Our greatest asset is our greatest humiliation. Cotton is king, but it is a badly served monarch. Other nations, by farsighted policy, intense activity, and commercial alertness, have overcome the tremendous advantage we have, and by beating down the price of the raw product, and with cheap labor on looms and machinery for the manufacture of the finished product, now control the markets of the world. In the Orient, where we once had our share of trade, the market, to say the least, is slipping from us. It seems almost a travesty on American business methods that English and German manufacturers can go on the docks at Galveston and take our raw cotton, carry it to Europe in subsidized ships, weave it with cheap labor, retransport it to the United States, pay the customs duty, and undersell our home manufacturers. There is something wrong here, isn't there?

Cotton is the clothing of the uncounted multitudes, and even those born to the purple depend upon cotton for much of their appareling. King Cotton's dominion is mankind. America, therefore, producing, practically alone, a commodity vital to civilized life and progress, has in that harvest the secret of incomparable wealth and power. It is not steel or lumber, kerosene or corn, that insures enduring leadership for the United States. Vast capital and dynamic genius have gone into the development of steel, yet this is transitory. The scepter of steel must ultimately slip from our grasp. The iron-ore beds of the Lake Superior region are doomed. Experts have numbered their years as less than a generation. Lumber cannot furnish a permanent foundation for our industrial pre-eminence. The forests are fast vanishing. Oil has contributed one of the leading items to our export trade, and has multiplied incredibly the fortunes of its managers; but the oil-wells cannot disgorge their illuminant forever. Besides the Baku fields are ready to compete. Our corn and wheat before the end of many decades will be consumed at home. Argentina, central Europe and Manchuria produce these cereals in prodigal abundance. Even if our corn and wheat were the world's sole sufficient supply, as in the case of our cotton, the oversea nations could dispense with these staples, as some of them now do. Millions upon millions of Mongolians have not yet developed an appetite for anything save rice. But all of them are clad in cotton goods. An additional inch on the shirts worn by the Mongolians would mean one million bales of cotton, and this is the market that is slipping from us.

Cotton Makes America Supreme Among Nations.

Thus it is cotton, and cotton alone, that can make America permanently unique and supreme among the nations. This fact makes grotesque the record of our unsuccess in selling finished cotton products across the sea. The only foreign customer that counted at all importantly in the totals of our export trade was China, and our market there has pitiably declined. England, Germany, and Japan are forcing our ships from the Pacific, just as they crowded them off the paths of the Atlantic. We should be carrying cargoes of cotton goods to all the ports of the earth. Instead of that the nations send here for 80 per cent. of their raw supply, manufacture it into all forms of commodities, outsell us in all the world's markets, and even successfully ship the manufactured goods back to the Americans who produce the raw supply. Switzerland, for example, which grows no cotton, whose mountains yield no coal for its factories, a country that has not an inch of seacoast or a plank afloat, sends to us, in the ships of other nations, more finished cotton goods than we export to all the countries of continental Europe combined.



ELI WHITNEY.

THE INVENTOR OF THE COTTON-GIN

America's future, when she realizes her heritage and opportunity in cotton, will eclipse anything that has been foretold for this republic. It is only within the last hundred years that cotton has conquered the world. The career of this plant has scarcely begun. The remarkable pace in its progress to power is revealed by the quaint fact that in 1784 eight bags of American cotton were seized by the customs authorities at Liverpool, the sage British verdict being that the importation was fraudulent, as so much cotton could not possibly be produced in one year in America! In Napoleon's campaigns thousands of the wounded could have been saved had there been an adequate supply of cotton for bandages.

Before Eli Whitney's time it took a man in his home two years to separate one bale of cotton from the seed. The yield of cotton thus handicapped on its way to the wearer was unimportant. There had been cotton from remote antiquity. The mummies of Peru were wrapped in it. The ancient Hindus wove it, and by some forgotten art the weaving was 5,000 times finer than is to be found in any of the fabrics of modern times. Cotton was a sacred thread among the Brahmans, and the theft of it a serious crime. In the gardens of Chinese temples at the present day a special variety of cotton-plant is found which is nowhere else grown. From its yield the vestments of the Confucian priests are made.

Great Britain has made an organized and scientific effort to raise a supply that would make her independent of America, for the statesmen of that empire foresee the possibilities of the day when America, rising to a recognition of her right, will manufacture her own cotton and sell it to the world. But Great Britain, with her grip upon all available areas, after many years of unsuccessful effort, has had to and must come continually to America for her supply.

The Standard Oil Company has made it possible to illumine millions of homes that otherwise would be in darkness, but this has been made practicable only through the cotton wick. When you are born they wrap you in cotton; when you die they bury you in a cotton shroud. Throughout life cotton is most constantly with man. It is his closest companion by day and keeps him comfortable at night. Cotton is spread upon his tables; it is in the upholstering of his chairs. If he takes a ride on the Flying Limited it is cotton waste in the wheel-boxes, through which lubricating-oil is fed to the running-gear, that insures a continuous trip. This is an electrical age, but without cotton insulation on the wires the might of electricity would be a menace.

SPINNING-ROOM OF A COTTON-MILL

Cotton has within itself, under the guiding hand of the country which produces it, the power to bring about ultimate world-peace. The United States, by prohibiting the exportation of raw cotton cargoes to England, Germany, France, Italy and Switzerland, could inflict hopeless industrial paralysis and financial panic upon those lands. The balance of power is in our hands to a most remarkable degree, but we treat it with indifference.

One word from America that it would withhold supplies of cotton would bring all Europe to terms of comity.

In the meantime, and until we reach the realization of the potency of cotton, if nations continue to waste their substance (and their purchasing power), in war, cotton will continue to be found indispensable in conflict. It is guncotton that hurls destruction through the ranks, and it is cotton that binds up the wounds of the fallen. The Japanese in their recent war, through an unrivaled system of surgery and hospital service, reduced the death-rate of the wounded to an unprecedented minimum. Without cotton that would have been impossible. And it is in cotton khaki that the armies march. And they make their bivouacs under cotton tents.

Cotton is indeed first in war, as it is first in peace!

Now we are entering a new age, the age of aerial flight, and the aeroplane is a cotton chariot! On these wings of cotton we have begun to fly through the heavens at 30 and 40 miles an hour, and the end is not yet.

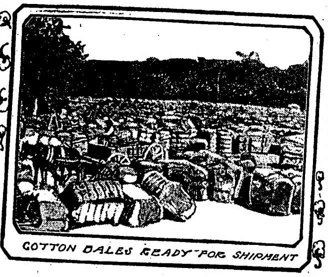
It is easy to forget, or at least to fail to keep in mind, that cotton cloth, the cloth of the civilized masses, without which they would become barbarians, is the product of a plant. Cloth grown from the soil! If by some botanical necromancy we could grow finished garments in the fields, and if these garments could be produced in like quantities in no other part of the earth, every man would instantly realize that America possessed a monopoly which would make all other nations our petitioners. Yet we have that monopoly as assured as it would be if we harvested clothing ready to wear, for if we ourselves produced the garments that we by our toil in the south enable Europe and Japan to manufacture, we would possess almost an exclusive supply of the cloth and clothing already needed by at least one-half of the human race.

Men cannot, if they would, again depend for their clothing upon the skins of wild animals. These beasts have practically vanished. Nor is there enough wilderness on the globe to furnish a range for the rearing of sufficient animals to provide garments of skins for mankind. The world of men and women is clothed to-day as never before. It is only within the last century, with cotton within the reach of the multitude, that the majority have been adequately clothed. The heroes of the revolution were half clad and that half was rags.

And it is one of the interesting ironies of history that during that period, when the problem of clothes was supreme, both in America and abroad, Richard Arkwright, who invented the spinning-frame, and James Hargreaves, who invented the spinning-jenny, creations which were to change the history of the race, had their machines destroyed by the enraged and half-clad populace, who feared the competition of these labor-saving devices.

We smile at the short-sighted folly of that day, and yet the progress in the use and manufacture of cotton will be as tremendous in the coming years as in the past. There is an actual kingship for cotton, not only commercially but politically; and this sovereignty of cotton in America I believe to be at hand.

We shall awake to our new destiny as a world-power and trading nation when we realize fully that the southern section of our republic is virtually the exclusive source of a commodity absolutely indispensable to the myriads of mankind from New York to Shanghai, from Nome to Montevideo, from London to the Cape. Less than one and a quarter million Americans, in 14 states of this union, hold in their hands the comfort, the luxury, the destiny of mankind.



COTTON BALES READY FOR SHIPMENT

An enormous profit is made somewhere in the progress of cotton to the consumer. Every year cotton goods to the value of nearly six billion dollars are turned out from the 125,000,000 spindles in the world. But the poor farmer in the cotton-fields sees but a pitiful part of the multiplying fortunes attending the migration of cotton goods around the earth. The southerner sells raw cotton to Japan, and the mills at Osaka turn out products that outsell our goods in Shanghai and Canton; and the Japanese cotton-manufacturer, traveling in state to America, may wonder wherein the half-fed southern farmer—a vassal tenant—following his one mule in the furrow, has advanced in civilization over the only recently awakened pagan of the east.

The ordinary grower of cotton cultivates 20 acres, producing one-half a bale to the acre. Unfortunately, in too great a majority of cases he is a tenant farmer. Of his ten bales, the result of his year's toil, five must go to the owner of the land. The working farmer, for his product, gets, we will say, ten cents a pound or $50 a bale, his 12 months of effort and expense bringing him in a gross revenue of $250. This is an insignificant total for the man who among others produces the commodity that controls the world.

Out of that $250 he must provide for his family, himself and his mule, and make provision for the ensuing times of planting and cultivating. Fully 65 per cent. of America's cotton is produced by this struggling method. Up to 1903, when the great movement in cotton prices blessed the southern industry with the transforming gleam of prosperity, 90 per cent. of our cotton crop was harvested in this same hopeless way.

FERTILE FARMS FOR THOUSANDS

AT THE OPENING OF THE STANDING ROCK AND CHEYENNE RIVER INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Registration at Mobridge, Lemmon or Aberdeen, S. D., October 4 to 23.

The opening of the Standing Rock and Cheyenne River Indian Reservations in South Dakota and North Dakota in October will give thousands of people 160 acres of fertile farming lands for a small sum per acre.

If you intend to engage in farming or are now farming and wish to change your location, why not register for one of these farms? It costs nothing to register.

Aberdeen, South Dakota, on the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, and Mobridge and Lemmon, South Dakota, on the Chicago, Milwaukee & Puget Sound Railway, are points of registration. You can register any day from October 4 to 23. The drawing will take place at Aberdeen on October 26.

This land opening will also give you a splendid opportunity to see the wonderful country opened through the construction of the new line to the Pacific Coast, at small additional cost over your railroad fare to points of registration.

Folders regarding this land opening and the country along the new line in South Dakota, North Dakota and Montana, free. F. A. Miller, General Passenger Agent, Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Ry., Chicago, Illinois.

Of Bad Scaling and Itching.

"I have been successfully cured of dry eczema. I was inspecting the removal of noxious weeds from the edge of a river and was constantly in the dust from the weeds. At night I cleansed my limbs but felt a prickly sensation. I paid no attention to it for two years but I noticed a scum on my legs like fish scales. I did not attend to it until it came to be too itchy and sore and began getting two running sores. My ankles were all sore and scabby and I could not wear shoes. I had to use carpet and felt slippers for weeks. I got a cake of the Cuticura Soap and some Cuticura Ointment. In less than ten days I could put on my boots and in less than three weeks I was free from the confounded itching. Capt. George P. The Great American railway busted at Gully. It is fortunate for the premoters that the farmers of that locality diden't catch them at it.

Now that the north pole has been discovered the general public would like to know what is on the other side of it. The life of the region between the known Artic and the Pole?

Judge Watts has reversed the supreme court in his decision in the Red Lake county tax rate case, and now it will be up to the supreme court to reverse themselves and sustain Judge Watts. What did someone say the supreme court did not reverse their decisions! You bet they do, and if you don't believe it, just look up their decisions in the Columbia county division case and you will see how easy it is for hisoner to reverse himself

The death of Harriman the great railroad king last week, worth about $200,000,000 is a bad crack at the inequalitys in this country, as preached from the socialist platform. He was one of a family of six children of a poverty stricken minister, who never had only two years eddecation in a church school. Where when and how did he get all this money? Did he have any better chance than his brothers, or any other born of poor parents? We had just as good a chance to make that amount of money during our life as he had, and we come out a few million dollars short, but we don't blame the "system" of government for it.

Tax Payers Must Dig Up.

If County Commissioners Pigeon, Demann, and Lindquist did voilate the law by transferring the ditch fund of $35,000, to the general fund for law suit expenses, we would arise to inquire: what our county attorney was doing that he did not stop them before they blowed in $4,000, of the money? In any ordinary county the commissioners usaly do their important official acts by advice of the county attorney, and we fail to see where any action for removel from office can be sustaind against the County Auditor and treasurer of this County for paying out money on the order of the Commissioners. If the commissioners was not acting under the advice of our county attorney it would seem that it was his duty to have put a stop to this ill legal transaction long before this time, but this county fight sometimes has a queer look to an observer outside of Thief River, or Red Lake Falls, as it begins to look as if the two towns was like two pugilists that was battering each other for the gate receipts. They have kept the fight going for the past four years until the county can no longer pay cash for tickets to see the show, and the county commissioner have levied an extra four mill tax to meet expenses. We can't see what is the use lawing about this extra tax levy for it this burning of court houses, and county seat lawsuits are to be keot up the taxpayers have got to foot the bills and they might just as well begin to "dig up" now as later on, for this great exhibition is not a free show.

The following is a synopis of the United States supreme court decisions regarding newspapor delinquent subscribers:

1. Subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary are considered to renew their subscription.

2. If subscribers order discontinuence of their papers, the publisher may continue to send the paper until all arrears are paid.

3. If subscribers neglect or refuse to take their periodicals from the post office they are responsiable until after they have setted their bill and orderd their paper discotinued.

4. If subscribers move to other places without informing the publisher and they continue, they are responsiable.

5. The couris have decided that refusing to take peoridicals from the postoffice or moveing away and leaveing them uncalled for. is prima facia evidance of fraud.

6. If subscribers pay in advance they are bound to give notice at the end of the time if they do not want to continue taking it, otherwise to send it until an express notice with all arreas is sent to the publisher.—Thirteen Towns.

The Poor Bridegroom.

"Even the English language emphasizes the insignificance of a man at his own wedding," said the prospective bridegroom disconsolately. "There isn't an independent word to designate him. He is merely called the groom of the bride, as if he were just about on a level with the bridesmaids and a little below the maid of honor. Best man, of course, means the bridegroom's best man, but the phrase itself tends to exalt this individual at the expense of his superior.

"Then there's no adjective to describe what pertains to the male half of the affair. You can't speak of the 'bridegroomal' trousers or necktie. On the other hand, 'bridal' applies not only to the possessions of the girl, but to what relates to both of them equally, like the trip and the bridal chamber. The very words 'matrimony' and 'matrimonial' are from the feminine side only. 'Patrimony' has nothing to do with the nuptials. It applies only to wealth and signifies that a man's part in the affair is to get out and hustle for the cash."—Philadelphia Ledger.

How Standing Armies Originated.

The earliest European standing army was that of Macedonia, established about 358 B. C. by Philip, father of Alexander the Great. It was the second in the world's history, having been preceded only by that of Sesotris Pharaoh of Egypt, who organized a military caste about 1600 B. C. Of modern standing armies, that formed by the Turkish janizaries was first, being fully organized in 1362. It was a century later that the standing army of France, the earliest in western Europe, was established by Charles VII. in the shape of "compagnies d'ordonnance," numbering 9,000 men. Rivalry thereupon compelled the nations to adopt similar means of defense. In England a standing army proper was first established by Cromwell, but was disbanded under Charles II., with the exception of a few regiments called the guards, or household brigade. This was the nucleus of England's present army.

A Girl's Preparedness.

There is something very pitiful about a girl. She wears calico, but talks knowingly about the latest styles in silks. Her home is furnished plainly, but she knows the latest styles in furniture; she knows how the silver ware should be arranged at dinners, the latest stitch for the marking of monograms on the finest table damask, the etiquette to be observed at a dinner, a reception or a ball, although she never attended anything more than a neighborhood party in her life. Her father's monthly income is not as large as the pin money a rich girl would spend in a day, but she knows what the rich girl should wear and buy to be in touch with the times. She is, in short, prepared at any time to marry a rich man and become a society leader.—Atchison Globe.

A Famous Poem.

J. C. Francis, the publisher of London Notes and Queries, has brought out a volume of reminiscences. One of his quotations records the editorial rejection of Campbell's "Hohenlinden" by the Greenock Advertiser. It runs thus:

T. C.—The lines commencing "On Linden when the sun was low" are not up to our standard. Poetry is evidently not T. C.'s forte.

CHINESE JUSTICE.

Li Hung Chang and the Men Who Tried to Poison Him.

When Li Hung Chang was Chinese premier and was having a bitter fight with some of the more conservative members of the tsung-li-yamen he received as a present a magnificent cake which he had reason to suspect contained poison. He put the cake aside and set all his powerful machinery to work to find out who was at the bottom of the plot. The investigation was partly successful, the crime being traced to three men, of whom one at least was absolutely guilty. Li had the trio arrested and brought to his yamen. When they arrived they were ushered into his presence and were received in his courtliest manner. The cake was produced with the remark that politeness forbade his tasting it until the three generous donors had had an opportunity to enjoy its excellence. Li cut the cake, and one of his servitors handed it to the unwilling guests. Each took a piece and ate or pretended to eat it. One crumbled the pieces and let them fall upon the floor, but the other two ate calmly, without manifesting any emotion. Ten minutes and the two men began to show symptoms of suffering. Li smiled benignantly and said to the man who had not eaten, "Your wisdom is so great that I am compelled to preserve your head as a souvenir to transcendent genius."

The man was removed and promptly decapitated. To the other two the premier remarked: "The cake that you are eating is not the one you sent, but one which I had my cook imitate. The poison from which you are suffering exists only in your imagination. I know of no way to cure your present pain except by letting you share the same fate as your friend who has just left the room."

As they were led away the statesman said to his retinue, "It is a pity that a man who can eat a deadly corrosive poison with an unmoved countenance should so misapply the talent wherewith heaven has endowed him."

Lavender Oil.

As four-fifths of the oil extracted from lavender is concealed in the bloom the harvest takes place just before the flower begins to fade at the end of August. The oil is distilled by means of steam, which is compelled to penetrate the closely packed lavender, afterward being drawn off in pipes that run through cold water. In this manner the steam is reconverted into water, but the process of passing through the lavender has extracted the oil, which floats on the surface of the water as it runs into glass jars down below. These jars have sprouts in the center, thus enabling the water to run out while the oil collects above the level of the exit. In this the first stage the oil is of a brownish blue tint, and it now has to be refined by passing once more through water. Thus all impurities are removed, and the oil runs out white, save for a very pale blue color similar to that observed in paraffin. Three pounds of oil will make thirty gallons of the perfume. The majority of ladies would be surprised if they were informed that a bottle of lavender water contains but about a thimbleful of pure oil, for a larger proportion would not only render the water too strong for use, but would burn holes through the handkerchief wherever the scent touched it. —London Standard.

THE UGLY RHINOCEROS

Flabby and Stumpy, Yet He Is as Quick as a Flash.

NOTED FOR HIS KEEN SCENT.

The Stupid Looking Brute Has a Nose That Makes Up For His Almost Useless Little Eyes—He Can Wheel at Full Speed Like a Polo Pony.

At first sight the African rhinoceros appears to be heavily handicapped by nature as regards his anatomy. His flabby, loutish body, short, stumpy legs, small, unblinking, piglike eyes and prehensile upper lip all combine to give him an air of stupid inactivity. Yet let him once scent danger, and how quickly is this idea dissipated. If lying down at the time, he is on his legs and facing the cause of disturbance in a flash. If satisfied that the danger is real, he turns in a second and is galloping up wind at a pace that compares favorably with that of a good horse.

To avoid obstructions he can turn and wheel at full speed like a polo pony and is capable of keeping up the pace for miles. In a straight race between a rhinoceros and a horse over two miles of the average country in which the former is met with, consisting, as it usually does, of black cotton soil and ordinary veld, the rhino would be fully able to hold his own.

Being very sure footed, obstacles, cracks in the ground and small holes which would cause a horse to stumble, if not come to grief altogether, have no effect on him whatever, and he will gallop down one side of a khor and up the other, leaving loose stones and debris rattling, but without one false step.

His great physical defect is his sight, his eyes being of very little use to him, and the hunter may walk straight up to him in open country till within 100 yards and, without exercising very much care, can by stalking, should the ground be fairly favorable, easily get within twenty yards before firing, always provided the approach is made from the leeward side. Any advantage he may lose owing to his bad eyesight is fully made up to him by his sense of smell.

The phrase "a nose like a fox terrier" is often applied to keenness of scent. This should rather be "a nose like a rhinoceros." There is very little chance of getting on terms with him if the approach is made from windward.

If lying down he almost invariably does so with his nose pointed down wind, consequently the hunter approaching, as he naturally should, from the leeward side, has only the quarry's defective sight and hearing to contend with.

In the daytime the rhino bird, or oxpecker (Buphaga africana), acts as a protection to him, sleeping and waking. There is a superstition among the natives that these small birds perform the duties of sentry. To a certain extent this is true. They are always flitting about and hanging on to him, feeding on the ticks with which he swarms, and on the approach of danger flutter about with little hoarse cries, which have the effect of rousing him and, if continued, cause him to rise up and look around.

It is almost impossible to calculate correctly what the action of a rhino will be on becoming aware of danger. No two of them seem to behave in the same way in similar circumstances. On the whole, it is safe to say that if only disturbed he will retreat, but should he be actually annoyed and see his enemy he will retaliate and charge.

Serious loss and delay are often caused by a rhino charging a caravan. Yet this action is nearly always forced upon him and occurs through stupidity rather than premeditated malice. The head of a caravan, say, of 300 porters, extending over two or three miles of country, passes to windward of a rhino. He gets the scent and moves up wind and perhaps nears the center of the caravan, when, being thoroughly alarmed, he turns off a little, only to strike the tail end.

Being now puzzled and seeing at last, as he thinks, the original cause of his annoyance, he charges straight through, on his way horning a load or two hastily cast aside by the porters on his approach. He then passes on to leeward of the caravan and, being at last delivered from the annoying scent, moves on into more peaceful territory. Yet a person who had not watched his progress from the start would think that he had come from a mile or more away with the deliberate intention of exterminating the caravan.

On the whole, it may be said that the disposition of the rhino is on a par with that of most animals and many human beings—they wish to be left alone, and unless worried they will not make trouble.—London Field.

The Krakatoa Eruption.

Perhaps the most remarkable volcanic eruption known was that which took place in August, 1883, at the island of Krakatoa, in the strait of Sunda. Streams of volcanic dust were thrown seventeen miles high and more than a cubic mile of material was expelled from the volcanic crater. The air waves started by the eruption traveled around the earth seven times. The noise was heard at Macassa, 900 miles away; at Borneo, 1,110 miles distant; in Western Australia, 1,700 miles away, and even at Rodagues, distant more than 2,000 miles. The dust and powdered pumice thrown out of the crater made the entire circuit of the earth before settling down and were the cause of the strange sunsets that were observed for many months.—New York American.

Heat Conductors.

Some substances conduct heat more freely than others, silver among the metals being the best conductor, and as a unit of measurement is taken at 1,000. Compared with silver as a conductor, gold is 981, copper 845, zinc 641, tin 422, steel 397 and wrought iron 436. Glass, wood, gases, liquids and resinous substances are bad conductors. Water is such a poor conductor that if heat is applied to the top it will boil at the top, while the bottom will remain cold.

DISCOVERY OF NORTH POLE RELATED BY ROBERT E. PEARY

Intrepid Explorer's Story of the Bold Dash by Which He Reached the Earth's Apex---Dr Cook's Claim Flatly Denied.

Notice to Publishers.

The following account by Commander Robert E. Peary of his successful voyage to the north pole was issued on September 10 by the New York Times Company at the request of Commander Peary and for his protection, as a book only, copyrighted and exposed for sale before any part of it was reproduced by any newspaper in the United States or Europe, in order to obtain the full protection of the copyright laws. REPORT OF THE DISCOVERY OF THE NORTH POLE by Robert E. Peary, Commander U. S. N., Copyright, 1909, by the New York Times Company.

DENIES COOK REACHED POLE.

Battle Harbor, Labrador (via Marconi wireless, Cape Ray, N. F.), Sept. 10.—Do not trouble about Cook's story, or attempt to explain any discrepancies in his statements. The affair will settle itself.

He has not been at the pole on April 21, 1908, or at any other time. He has simply handed the public a gold brick.

These statements are made advisedly, and I have proof of them. When he makes a full statement of his journey over his signature to some geographical society, or other reputable body, if that statement contains the claim that he has reached the pole, I shall be in a position to furnish material that may prove distinctly interesting reading for the public.

ROBERT E. PEARY.

Battle Harbor, Labrador (via Marconi wireless, Cape Ray, N. F.), Sept. 9.—The steamer Roosevelt, bearing the north polar expedition of the Peary Arctic club, parted company with the Erik and steamed out of Etah fiord late in the afternoon of August 18, 1908, setting the usual course for Cape Sabine. The weather was dirty, with fresh southerly winds. We had on board 22 Eskimo men, 17 women, and 10 children, 226 dogs, and some forty odd walrus.

We encountered the ice a short distance from the mouth of the harbor, but it was not closely packed, and was negotiated by the Roosevelt without serious difficulty.

FIND MUCH WATER.

As we neared Cape Sabine the weather cleared somewhat and we passed by Three Voort island and Cape Sabine, easily making out with the naked eye the house at Hayes harbor occupied by me in the winter of 1901-02.

From Cape Sabine north there was so much water that we thought of setting the lug sail before the southerly wind, but a little later appearance of ice to the northward stopped this.

There was clean open water to Cape Albert, and from there scattered ice to a point about abreast of Victoria Head, thick weather and dense ice bringing us some ten or fifteen miles away.

From here we drifted south somewhat and then got aslant to the northward out of the current. We worked a little further north and stopped again for some hours. Then we again worked westward and northward till we reached a series of lakes, coming to a stop a few miles south of the Windward's winter quarters at Cape Durville.

From here, after some delay, we slowly worked a way northeastward through fog and broken ice of medium thickness through one night and the forenoon of the next day, only emerging into open water and clear weather off Cape Fraser.

STRIKE ICE AND FOG.

From this point we had a clear run through the middle of Robeson channel uninterrupted by either ice or fog, to Lady Franklin bay. Here we encountered both ice and fog, and while working along in search of a practicable opening were forced across to the Greenland coast at Thank God Harbor.

The fog lifted there and enabled us to make out our whereabouts and we steamed north through a series of leads past Cape Lupton, and thence southward toward Cape Union. A few miles off that cape we were stopped by impracticable ice, and we drifted back south to Cape Union, where we stopped again.

SHIP FORCED AGROUND.

We lay for some time in a lake of water, and then, to prevent being drifted south again, took refuge under the north shore of Lincoln bay, in nearly the identical place where we had our unpleasant experiences three years before. Here we remained for severeal days during a period of constant and at times violent northeasterly winds.

Twice we were forced aground by the heavy ice; we had our port quarter rail broken and a hole stove in the bulwarks, and twice we pushed out in an attempt to get north, but were forced back each time to our precarious shelter.

HEAVY RUNNING ICE.

Finally on September 3 we squeezed around Cape Union and made fast in a shallow niche in the ice, but after some hours we made another short run to Black cape and hung on to a grounded bit of ice. At last, a little after midnight of September 5, we passed through extremely heavy running ice into a stream of open water, rounded Cape Rawson and passed Cape Sheridan.

Within a quarter of an hour of the same time we arrived three years before—seven a. m., September 5—we reached the open water extending beyond Cape Sheridan.

We steamed up to the end of it and it appeared practicable at first to reach Porter bay, near Cape Joseph Henly, which I had for my winter quarters, but the outlook being unsatisfactory, I went back and put the Roosevelt into the only opening in the floe, being barred close to the mouth of the Sheridan river a little north of our position three years prior.

PUT UP FOR WINTER.

The season was further advanced than in 1905; there was more snow on the ground and the new ice inside the floe bergs was much thicker.

The work of discharging the ship was commenced at once and rushed to completion. The supplies and equipment we sledged across ice and sea and deposited on shore. A house and workshop were built of board, covered with sails, and fitted with stoves, and the ship was snug for winter in shoal water, where it touched bottom at low tide.

The settlement on the stormy shores of the Arctic ocean was christened Hubbardville.

Hunting parties were sent out on September 10 and a bear was brought in on the 12th and some deer a day or two later.

PREPARE FOR SLEDGE TRIP.

On September 15 the full work of transferring supplies to Cape Columbia was inaugurated. Marvin with Dr. Goodsall and Borup and the Eskimos, took 16 sledge loads of supplies to Cape Belknap and on the 27th the same party started with loads to Porter bay.

The work of hunting and transporting supplies was prosecuted continuously by the members of the party and the Eskimos until November 5, when the supplies for the spring sledge trip had been removed from winter quarters and deposited at various places from Cape Colan to Cape Columbia.

The latter part of September the movement of the ice subjected the ship to a pressure which listed it to port some eight or ten degrees, and it did not recover till the following spring.

On October 1 I went on a hunt with two Eskimos across the field and Pass bay and the peninsula, made the circuit of Clemants Markham inlet, and returned to the ship in seven days with 15 musk oxen, a bear and a deer.

Later in October I repeated the trip, obtaining five musk oxen, and hunting parties secured some 40 deer.

SUPPLIES MOVED TO BASE.

In the February moon Bartlett went to Cape Hecla, Goodsall moved some more supplies from Hecla to Cape Colan, and Borup went to Markham inlet on a hunting trip. On February 15 Bartlett left the Roosevelt with his division for Cape Columbia and Parr bay.

Goodsall, Borup, MacMillan and Hansen followed on successive days with their provisions. Marvin returned from Cape Bryant on February 17 and left for Cape Columbia on February 21. I brought up the rear on February 22.

The total of all divisions leaving the Roosevelt was seven members of the party, 59 Eskimos, 140 dogs and 23 sledges.

MAKE READY FOR DASH.

By February 27 such of the Cape Colan depot as was needed had been brought up to Cape Columbia, the dogs were rested and double rationed and harnessed, and the sledges and other gear overhauled.

Four months of northerly winds during the fall and winter instead of southerly ones, as during the previous season, led me to expect less open water than before, but a great deal of rough ice, and I was prepared to hew a road through the jagged ice for the first hundred miles or so, then cross the big lead.

BARTLETT LEADS THE WAY.

On the last day of February Bartlett, with his pioneer division, accomplished this, and his division got away due north over the ice on March 1. The rest of the party got away on Bartlett's trail, and I followed an hour later.

The party now comprised seven members of the expedition, 17 Eskimos, 133 dogs and 19 sledges. One Eskimo and seven dogs had gone to pieces.

A strong easterly wind, drifting snow, and temperature in the minus marked our departure from the camp at Cape Columbia, which I had christened Crane City. Rough ice in the first march damaged several sledges and smashed two beyond repair, the teams going back to Columbia for other sledges in reserve there.

PASS BRITISH RECORD.

We camped ten miles from Crane City. The easterly wind and low temperature continued. In the second march we passed the British record made by Markham in May, 1876—82.20—and were stopped by open water, which had been formed by wind after Bartlett passed.

In this march we negotiated the lead and reached Bartlett's third camp. Borup had gone back from here, but missed his way, owing to the faulting of the trail by the movement of the ice.

Marvin came back also for more fuel and alcohol. The wind continued, forming open water all about us. At the end of the fourth march we came upon Bartlett, who had been stopped by a wide lake of open water. We remained here from March 4 to March 11.

GETS GLIMPSE OF SUN.

At noon of March 5 the sun, red and shaped like a football by excessed reflection, just raised itself above the horizon for a few minutes and then disappeared again. It was the first time I had seen it since October 1.

I now began to feel a good deal of anxiety because there were no signs of Marvin and Borup, who should have been there for two days. Besides, they had the alcohol and oil, which were indispensable for us.

We concluded that they had either lost the trail or were imprisoned on an island by open water, probably the latter.

Fortunately, on March 11 the lead was practicable and, leaving a note for Marvin and Borup to push on after us by forced marches, we proceeded northward. The sounding of the lead gave 110 fathoms.

During this march we crossed the eighty-fourth parallel and traversed a succession of just frozen leads, from a few hundred yards to a mile in width. This march was really simple.

On the fourteenth we got free of the leads and came on decent going. While we were making camp a courier from Marvin came and informed me he was on the march in the rear. The temperature was 59 below zero.

The following morning, March 15, I sent Hansen with his division north to pioneer a trail for five marches, and Dr. Goodsell, according to the program, started back to Cape Columbia.

M'MILLAN TURNS BACK.

At night Marvin and Borup came spinning in with their men and dogs steaming in the bitter air like a squadron of battleships. Their arrival relieved me of all anxiety as to our oil supply.

In the morning I discovered that MacMillan's foot was badly frost bitten. The mishap had occurred two or three days before, but MacMillan had said nothing about it in the hope that it would come out all right.

A glance at the injury showed me that the only thing was to send him back to Cape Columbia at once. The arrival of Marvin and Borup enabled me to spare sufficient men and dogs to go back with him.

On leaving the camp the expedition comprised 16 men, 12 sledges and 100 dogs. The next march was satisfactory as regards distance and the character of the going. In the latter part there were pronounced movements in the ice, both visible and audible.

Some leads were crossed, in one of which Borup and his team took a bath, and we were finally stopped by an impracticable lead opening in front of us. We camped in a temperature of 50 degrees below.

At the end of two short marches we came upon Hansen and his party in camp, mending their sledges. We devoted the remainder of the day to overhauling and mending sledges and breaking up our damaged ones for material.

MAKE FORCED MARCHES.

The next morning I put Marvin in the lead to pioneer the trail, with instructions to make two forced marches to bring up our average which had been cut down by the last two short ones. Marvin carried out his instructions implicitly. A considerable amount of young ice assisted in this.

At the end of the tenth march, latitude 85.23, Borup turned back in command of the second supporting party, having traveled a distance equivalent to Nansen's distance from this far to his farthest north.

I was sorry to lose this young Yale runner, with his enthusiasm and pluck. He had led his heavy sledge over the floes in a way that commanded everyone's admiration and would have made his father's eyes glisten.

CHANGES HIS PLAN.

From this point the expedition comprised 20 men, 10 sledges, and 70 dogs. It was necessary for Marvin to take a sledge from here, and I put Bartlett and his division in advance to pioneer the trail.

The continual daylight enabled me to make a moderation here that brought my advance and main parties closer together and reduced the likelihood of their being separated by open leads.

After Bartlett left camp with Henderson and their division, Marvin and I remained with our division 20 hours longer and then followed. When we reached Bartlett's camp he broke out and went on and we turned in. By this arrangement the advance party was traveling while the main party was asleep, and vice versa, and I was in touch with my advance party every 24 hours.

MOVES EXPEDITIOUSLY.

I had no reason to complain of the going for the next two marches, though for a less experienced party, less adaptable sledges, or less perfect equipment it would have been an impossibility.

At our position at the end of the second march, Marvin obtained a satisfactory sight for latitude in clear weather, which placed us at 85.48. The result agreed satisfactorily with the dead reckoning of Marvin, Bartlett and myself.

Up to this time, the slight altitude of the sun had made it not worth while to waste time in observations.

On the next two marches the going improved, and we covered good distances. In one of these marches a lead delayed us a few hours. We finally ferried across the ice cakes.

MAKES RECORD RUN.

The next day Bartlett let himself out, evidently, for a record, and reeled off 20 miles. Here Marvin obtained another satisfactory sight on latitude, which gave the position as 86.38 (or beyond the farthest north of Nansen and Abruzzi), and showed that we had covered 50 minutes of latitude in three marches.

In these three marches we had passed the Norwegian record of 86.14, by Nansen, and the Italian record of 86.34, by Cagni.

From this point Marvin turned back in command of the third supporting party. My last words to him were: "Be careful of the leads, my boy."

The party from this point comprised nine men, seven sledges, and 60 dogs. The conditions at this camp and the apparently unbroken expanse of fairly level ice in every direction reminded me of Cagni's description of his farthest north.

DANGER IS ENCOUNTERED.

But I was not deceived by the apparently favorable outlook, for available conditions never continue for any distance or any length of time in the arctic regions.

The next march was over good going, but for the first time since leaving land we experienced that condition, frequent over these ice fields, of a hazy atmosphere, in which the light is equal everywhere. All relief is destroyed, and it is impossible to see for any distance.

We were obliged in this march to make a detour around an open lead. In the next march we encountered the heaviest and deepest snow of the journey, through a thick, smothering mantle lying in the depressions of heavy rubble ice.

Temporarily Discouraged.

I came upon Bartlett and his party, fagged out and temporarily discouraged by the heartracking work of making road.

I knew what was the matter with them. They were simply spoiled by the good going on the previous marches. I rallied them a bit, lightened their sledges and sent them on encouraged again.

During the next march we traveled through a thick haze drifting over the ice before a biting air from the northeast. At the end of the march we came upon the captain camped beside a wide open lead with a dense black water sky northwest, north and northeast.

The next march was also a long one. It was Bartlett's last hit. He let himself out over a series of large old floes, steadily increasing in diameter and covered with hard snow.

WIND HELPS OUT.

During the last few miles I walked beside him or in advance. He was solemn and anxious to go further, but the program was for him to go back from here in command of the fourth supporting party, and there were no supplies for an increase in the main party.

In this march we encountered a high wind for the first time since the three days after we left Cape Columbia. It was dead in our faces, bitter and insistent, but I had no reason to complain, it was better than an easterly or southerly wind, either of which would have set us adrift in open water, while this was closing up every lead behind.

This furnished another advantage of my supporting parties. True, by so doing it was pressing to the south the ice over which we traveled, and so robbing us of a hundred miles of advantage.

EIGHTY-FOUR IS PASSED.

We concluded we were on or near the eighty-eighth parallel, unless the north wind had lost us several miles. The wind blew all night and all next day.

At this camp, in the morning, Bartlett started to walk five or six miles to the north to make sure of reaching the eighty-eighth parallel. While he was gone I selected the 40 best dogs in the outfit and had them doubled.

I picked out five of the best sledges and assigned them expressly to the captain's party. I broke up the seventh for material with which to repair the others and set Eskimos at this work.

Bartlett returned in time to take a satisfactory observation for latitude in clear weather, and obtained for our position 87.48, and that showed that the continued north wind had robbed us of a number of miles of hard-earned distance.

Bartlett took the observation there, as had Marvin five camps back, partly to save my eyes, but largely to give an independent record and determination of our advance.

The observations completed and two copies made, one for him and the other for me, Bartlett started on the back trail in command of my fourth supporting party, with two Eskimos, one sledge and 18 dogs.

BARTLETT DID GOOD WORK.

When he left I felt for a moment pangs of regret as he disappeared in the distance, but it was only momentary. My work was still ahead, not in the rear.

Bartlett had done good work and had been a great help to me. Circumstances had thrust the brunt of the pioneering upon him instead of dividing it among several, as I had planned.

He had reason to take pride in the fact that he had bettered the Italian record by a degree and a quarter and had covered a distance equal to the entire distance of the Italian expedition from Franz Josef's land to Cagni's farthest north.

I had given Bartlett this position and post of honor in command of my fourth and last supporting party, and for two reasons: first, because of his magnificent handling of the Roosevelt; second, because he had cheerfully stood between me and many trifling annoyances on the expeditions.

Then there was a third reason. It seemed to me appropriate in view of the magnificent British record of arctic work, covering three centuries, that it should be a British subject who could boast that, next to an American, he had been nearest the pole.

LAST STRUGGLE AT HAND.

With the disappearance of Bartlett I turned to the problem before me. This was that for which I had worked for 32 years, for which I had lived the simple life; for which I had conserved all my energy on the upward trip; for which I had trained myself as for a race, crushing down every worry about success.

In spite of my years, I felt in trim—fit for the demands of the coming days and eager to be on the trail.

As for my party, my equipment, and my supplies, I was in shape beyond my most sanguine dreams of earliest years.

My party might be regarded as an ideal, which had now come to realization—as loyal and responsive to my will as the fingers of my right hand.

PARTY IDEAL FOR EFFORT.

Four of them possess the technique of dogs, sledges, ice, and cold as their heritage. Two of them, Hansen and Ootam, were my companions to the farthest point three years before. Two others, Eginwuk and Sigloo, were in Clark's division, which had such a narrow escape at that time, and now were willing to go anywhere with my immediate party, and willing to risk themselves again in any supporting party.

The fifth was a young man who had never served before in any expedition, but who was, if possible, even more willing and eager than the others for the princely gifts—a boat, a rifle, a shotgun, ammunition, knives, etc., which I had promised to each of them who reached the pole with me; for he knew that these riches would enable him to wrest from a stubborn father the girl whose image filled his hot young heart.

HAD CONFIDENCE IN HIM.

All had blind confidence so long as I was with them, and gave no thought for the morrow, sure that whatever happened I should somehow get them back to land. But I dealt with the party equally. I recognized that all its impetus centered in me, and that whatever pace I set it would make good. If anyone played out, I would stop for a short time.

I had no fault to find with the conditions. My dogs were the best, the pick of 122 with which we left Columbia. Almost all were powerful males, hard as nails, in good flesh, but without a superfluous ounce, and, what was better yet, they were all in good spirits.

My sledges, now that the repairs were completed, were in good condition. My supplies were ample for 40 days, and, with the reserve represented by the dogs themselves, could be made to last 50.

HIS PROGRAM PLANNED.

Pacing back and forth in th ice of the pressure ridge where the igloos were built, while my men got their loads ready for the next marches, I settled on my program. I decided I should strain every nerve to make five marches of 15 miles each, crowding these marches in such a way as to bring us to the end of the fifth long enough before noon to permit the immediate taking of an observation for latitude.

Weather and leads permitting, I believed I could do this. If my proposed distances were cut down by any chance I had two means in reserve for making up the deficit:

First—To make the last march a forced one, stopping to make tea and rest the dogs, but not to sleep.

Second—At the end of the fifth march to make a forced march with a light sledge, a double team of dogs, and one or two of the party, leaving the rest in camp.

SEES DANGER IN GALE.

Underlying all these calculations was a recognition of the ever present neighborhood of open leads and impassable water, and the knowledge that a 24-hour gale would knock all my plans into a cocked hat, and even put us in imminent peril.

At a little after midnight of April 1, after a few hours of sound sleep, I hit the trail, leaving the others to break up camp and follow.

As I climbed the pressure ridge back of our igloos I set another hole in my belt, the third since I started. Every man and dog of us was lean and flat bellied as a board and as hard.

CONDITIONS ALL FAVORABLE.

It was a fine morning. The wind of the last two days had subsided, and the going was the best and most equable of any I had had yet. The floes were large and old, and clear, and were surrounded by pressure ridges, some of which were almost stupendous.

The biggest of them, however, were easily negotiated, either through some crevice or up some huge brink. I set a good pace for about ten hours. Twenty-five miles took me well beyond the eighty-eighth parallel.

While I was building my igloos a long lead forward by the east and southwest of us at a distance of a few miles.

TRAVEL WAS EASY.

A few hours' sleep and we were on the trail again. As the going was now practically horizontal, we were unhampered and could travel as long as we pleased and sleep as little as we wished.

The weather was fine and the going like that of the previous day, except at the beginning, when pickaxes were required. This and a brief stop at another lead cut down our distance. But we had made 20 miles in ten hours and were half way to the eighty-ninth parallel.

The ice was grinding audibly in every direction, but no motion was visible. Evidently it was settling back into equilibrium and probably sagging due northward with its release from the wind pressure.

SURFACE ALMOST LEVEL.

Again there was a few hours' sleep and we hit the trail before midnight. The weather and going were even better. The surface, except as interrupted by infrequent ridges, was as level as the glacial fringe from Hecla to Columbia, and harder.

We marched something over ten hours, the dogs being often on the trot, and made 20 miles. Near the end of the march we rushed across a lead 100 yards wide, which buckled under our sledges and finally broke as the last sledge left it.

We stopped in sight of the eighty-ninth parallel in a temperature of 40 degrees below. Again a scant sleep and we were on our way once more and across the eighty-ninth parallel.

This march duplicated the previous one as to weather and going. The last few hours it was on young ice and occasionally the dogs were galloping.

We made twenty-five miles or more, the air, the sky, and the bitter wind burning the face till it cracked. It was like the great interior ice gap of Greenland. Even the natives complained of the bitter air. It was as keen as frozen steel.

A little longer sleep than the previous one had to be taken here, as we were all in need of it. Then on again.

Up to this time, with each successive march, our fear of an impassable lead had increased. At every inequality of the ice I found myself hurrying breathlessly forward, fearing that it marked a lead, and when I arrived at the summit would catch my breath with relief—only to find myself hurrying on in the same way at the next one.

But on this march, by some strange shift of feeling, this fear fell from me completely. The weather was thick, but it gave me no uneasiness.

Before I turned in I took an observation which indicated our position as 89 degrees 25 minutes.

A rise in temperature to 15 degrees below reduced the friction of the sledges and gave the dogs the appearance of having caught the spirits of the party. The more sprightly ones, as they went along with tightly curled tails, frequently tossed their heads, with short, sharp barks and yelps.

In 12 hours we had made 40 miles. There was no sign of a lead in the march.

ARRIVAL AT THE POLE.

I had now made my five marches, and was in time for a hasty noon observation through a temporary break in the clouds, which indicated our position as 89.57. I quote an entry from my journal some hours later:

The pole at last. The prize of three centuries, my dream and goal for 20 years, mine at last. I cannot bring myself to realize it.

It all seems so simple and commonplace. As Bartlett said when turning back, when speaking of his being in these exclusive regions, which no mortal has ever penetrated before: "It is just like every day."

Of course I had my sensations that made sleep impossible for hours, despite my utter fatigue—the sensations of a lifetime; but I have no room for them here.

The first 30 hours at the pole were spent in taking observations; in going some ten miles beyond our camp and some eight miles to the right of it; in taking photographs, planting my flags, depositing my records, studying the horizon with my telescope for possible land, and searching for a practicable place to make a sounding.

PLAN FOR RETURN TRIP.

Ten hours after our arrival the clouds cleared before a light breeze from our left and from that time until our departure in the afternoon of April 7 the weather was cloudless and flawless.

The minimum temperature during the 30 hours was 33 below, the maximum 12.

We had reached the goal, but the return was still before us. It was essential that we reach the land before the next spring tide, and we must strain every nerve to do this.

I had a brief talk with my men. From now on it was to be a big travel, little sleep and a hustle every minute.

We would try, I told them, to double march on the return—that is, to start and cover one of our northward marches, make tea and eat our luncheon in the igloos, then cover another march, eat and sleep a few hours, and repeat this daily.

SPEED NEARLY DOUBLED.

As a matter of fact, we nearly did this, covering regularly on our return journey five outward marches in three return marches.

Just as long as we could hold the trail we could double our speed, and we need waste no time in building new igloos every day, so that the time we gained on the return lessened the chances of a gale destroying the track.

Just above the eighty-seventh parallel was a region some fifty miles wide which caused me considerable uneasiness. Twelve hours of strong easterly, westerly, or northerly wind would make this region an open sea.

In the afternoon of the 7th we started on our return, having double fed the dogs, repaired the sledges for the last time, and discarded all our spare clothing to lighten the loads.

TRIES TO SOUND SEA.

Five miles from the pole a narrow crack filled with recent ice, through which we were able to work a hole with a pickax, enabled me to make a sounding. All my wire, 1,500 fathoms, was sent down, but there was no bottom.

In pulling up the wire parted a few fathoms from the surface and lead and wire went to the bottom. Off went reel and handle, lightening the sledges still further. We had no more use for them now.

Three marches brought us back to the igloos where the captain turned back. The last march was in the wild sweep of a northerly gale, with drifting snow and the ice rocking under as we dashed over it.

NOT DELAYED BY LEADS.

South of where Marvin had turned back we came to where his party had built several igloos while delayed by open leads. Still further south we found where the captain had been held up by an open lead and obliged to camp.

Fortunately the movement of these leads was simply open and shut, and it took considerable water motion to fault the trail seriously.

While the captain, Marvin, and as I found later, Borup, had been delayed by open leads, we seemed to bear a charm and with no single lead were we delayed more than a couple of hours. Sometimes the ice was fast and firm enough to carry us across; sometimes a short detour, sometimes a brief halt for the lead to close, sometimes an improvised ferry on an ice cake, kept the trail without difficulty down to the tenth outward march.

LOSE BARTLETT'S TRAIL.

Igloos there disappeared completely and the entire region was unrecognizable. Where on the outward journey had been narrow cracks, there were now broad leads, one of them over five miles in width, caught over with young ice.

Here again fortune favored us, and no pronounced movement of the ice having taken place since the captain passed, we had his trail to follow. We picked up the old trail again north of the seventh igloos, followed it beyond the fifth, and at the big lead lost it finally.

From here we followed the captain's trail, and on April 23 our sledges passed up the vertical edge of the glacier fringe, a little west of Cape Columbia.

When the last sledge came up I thought my Eskimos had gone crazy. They yelled and called and danced themselves helpless. As Ootah sat down on his sledge he remarked, in Eskimo:

"The devil is asleep or having trouble with his wife, or we never should have come back so easily."

A few hours later we arrived at Crane City, under the bluffs of Cape Columbia, and, after putting four pounds of pemmican into each of the faithful dogs to keep them quiet, we had, at last, our chance to sleep.

LONG SLEEP WELCOME.

Never shall I forget that sleep at Cape Columbia. It was sleep, sleep, then turn over and sleep again. We slept gloriously, with never a thought of the morrow or having to walk and, too, with no thought that there was to be never a night more of blinding headache.

Cold water to a parched throat is nothing compared with sleep to a numbed, fatigued brain and body.

Two days we spent here in sleeping and drying our clothes. Then for the ship. Our dogs, like ourselves, had not been hungry when we arrived, but simply lifeless with fatigue. They were different animals now, and the better ones among them swept on with tightly curled tails and uplifted heads and their hind legs treading the snow with pistonlike regularity.

MARVIN'S FATE LEARNED.

We reached Hecla in one march and the Roosevelt in another. When we got to the Roosevelt I was staggered by the news of the fatal mishap to Marvin. He had either been less cautious or less fortunate than the rest of us, and his death emphasized the risk to which we all had been subjected, for there was not one of us but had been in the sledge at some time during the journey.

The big lead, cheated of its prey three years before, had at last gained its human victim.

The rest can be told quickly. McMillan and Borup had started for the Greenland coast to deposit caches for me. Before I arrived a flying Eskimo courier from me overtook them with instructions that the caches were no longer needed and they were to concentrate their energies on the ideal observations, etc., at Cape Morris K. Jesup and north from there.

ROOSEVELT STARTS BACK.

These instructions were carried out and after their return in the latter part of May McMillan made some further tidal observations at other points. The supplies remaining at the various caches were brought in and on July 18 the Roosevelt left its winter quarters and was driven out into the channel back of Cape Nion.

It fought its way south in the center of the channel and passed Cape Sabine on August 8, or 30 days earlier than in 1908, and 32 days earlier than the British expedition in 1876.

We picked up Whitney and his party and stores at Etah. We killed seventy-odd walrus for my Eskimos, whom I landed at their homes. We met the Jeanie off Saunders island and took over its coal and cleared from Cape York on August 26, one month earlier than in 1906.

ANNOUNCES HIS TRIUMPH.

On September 5 we arrived at Indian Harbor, whence the message, "Stars and stripes nailed to north pole," was sent vibrating southward through the crisp Labrador air.

The culmination of long experience, a thorough knowledge of the conditions of the problem gained in the last expedition—these, together with a new type of sledge which reduced the work of both dogs and driver, and a new type of camp cooler which added to the comfort and increased the hours of sleep of the members of the party, combined to make the present expedition an agreeable improvement upon the last in respect to the rapidity and effectiveness of its work and the lessened discomfort and strain upon the members of the party.

HIS CAPABLE AIDS.

As to the personnel, I have again been particularly fortunate. Capt. Bartlett is just Bartlett—tireless, sleepless, enthusiastic, whether on the bridge or in the crow's nest or at the head of a sledge division in the field.

Dr. Goodsell, the surgeon of the expedition, not only looked after its health and his own specialty of microscopes but took his full share of the field work of the expedition as well, and was always ready for any work.

Profs. Marvin and McMillan have secured a mass of scientific data, having made all the tidal and most of the field work, and their services were invaluable in every way.

BORUP AND OTHERS PRAISED.

Borup not only made the record as to the distance traveled during the journey, but to his assistance and his expert knowledge of photography is due what I believe to be the unequaled series of photographs taken by the expedition.

Henson in the field and Percy as steward were the same as ever, invaluable in their respective lines.

Chief Engineer Wardwell, also of the last expedition, aided by his assistant, Scott, kept the machinery up to a high state of efficiency and has given the Roosevelt the force and power which enabled it to negotiate apparently impracticable ice.

Mr. Gushue, the mate, who was in charge of the Roosevelt during the absence of Capt. Bartlett and myself, and Boatswain Murphy, who was put in charge of the station at Etah for the relief of Cook, were both trustworthy and reliable men, and I count myself fortunate in having had them in my service.

HAD A WILLING CREW.

The members of the crew and the firemen were a distinct improvement over those of our last expedition. Every one of them was willing and anxious to be of service in every possible way.

Connors, who was promoted to be bos'n in the absence of Murphy, proved to be practically effective.

Barnes, seaman, and Wiseman and Joyce, firemen, not only assisted Marvin and McMillan in their tidal and meteorological observations on the Roosevelt, but Wiseman and Barnes went into the field with them on their trips to Cape Columbia, and Condon and Cody covered 1,000 miles hunting and sledging supplies.

PRESENTS FOR ESKIMOS.

As for my faithful Eskimos, I have left them with ample supplies of dark, rich walrus meat and blubber for their winter, with currants, sugar, biscuits, guns, rifles, ammunition, knives, hatchets, traps, etc.

For the splendid four who stood beside me at the pole a boat and tent each to requite them for their energy and the hardship and toil they underwent to help their friend Peary to the north pole.

But all of this—the dearly bought years of experience, the magnificent strength of the Roosevelt, the splendid energy and enthusiasm of my party, the loyal faithfulness of my Eskimos—could have gone for naught but for the faithful necessaries of war furnished so loyally by the members and friends of the Peary Arctic club.

Their assistance has enabled me to tell the last of the great earth stories, the story the world has been waiting to hear for 300 years—the story of the discovery of the north pole.

ROBERT E. PEARY.

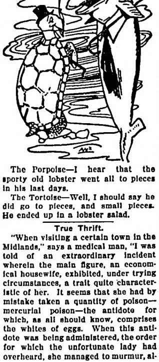
WHAT IS PAINT?

The paint on a house is the extreme outside of the house. The wood is simply a structural under layer. That is as it should be. Unprotected wood will not well withstand weather. But paint made of pure white lead and linseed oil is an invulnerable armor against sun and rain, heat and cold. Such paint protects and preserves, fortifying the perishable wood with a complete metallic casing.

And the outside of the house is the looks of the house. A well-constructed building may be greatly depreciated by lack of painting or by poor painting.

National Lead Company have made it possible for every building owner to be absolutely sure of pure white lead paint before applying. They do this by putting upon every package of their white lead their Dutch Boy Painter trademark. That trademark is a complete guarantee.

DEEP SEA TALK.



The Porpoise—I hear that the sporty old lobster went all to pieces in his last days.

The Tortoise—Well, I should say he did go to pieces, and small pieces. He ended up in a lobster salad.

True Thrift.

"When visiting a certain town in the Midlands," says a medical man, "I was told of an extraordinary incident wherein the main figure, an economical housewife, exhibited, under trying circumstances, a trait quite characteristic of her. It seems that she had by mistake taken a quantity of poison—mercurial poison—the antidote for which, as all should know, comprises the whites of eggs. When this antidote was being administered, the order for which the unfortunate lady had overheard, she managed to murmur, although almost unconscious. "Mary, Mary! Save the yolks for the puddings!"—Tit-Bits.

By Automobile Up Mount Rainier.

United States Engineer Eugene Ricksecker celebrated Independence day by throwing open the government road in the Mount Rainer National park. Vehicles and horsemen now have an excellent thoroughfare from tidewater to Narada falls, near snow line in Paradise valley. Mr. Ricksecker says that autos and wagons can now make the trip with comfort. The maximum grade on the road is four per cent. Nearly a score of automobiles, all loaded, went to the mountain.

A Useful Baby.

Speaking of tricks to win the sympathy of juries in criminal cases, Judge Williard M. McEwen, in a recent address before the Illinois State's Attorneys' association, said: "I know of four cases where a baby played a prominent part in getting the acquittal of the defendant, and I later learned that the same baby had been used in each of the cases, although the supposed mothers in each case were different women."—Law Notes.

PRESSED HARD
Coffee's Weight on Old Age.

When prominent men realize the injurious effects of coffee and the change in health that Postum can bring, they are glad to lend their testimony for the benefit of others.

A superintendent of public schools in North Carolina says:

"My mother since her early childhood, was an inveterate coffee drinker and had been troubled with her heart for a number of years, and complained of that 'weak all over' feeling and sick stomach.

"Some time ago I was making an official visit to a distant part of the country and took dinner with one of the merchants of the place. I noticed a somewhat peculiar flavor of the coffee, and asked him concerning it. He replied that it was Postum.

"I was so pleased with it, that after the meal was over, I bought a package to carry home with me, and had wife prepare some for the next meal. The whole family liked it so well, that we discontinued coffee and used Postum entirely.

"I had really been at times very anxious concerning my mother's condition, but we noticed that after using Postum for a short time, she felt so much better than she did prior to its use, and had little trouble with her heart and no sick stomach; that the headaches were not so frequent, and her general condition much improved. This continued until she was as well and hearty as the rest of us.

"I know Postum has benefited myself and the other members of the family, but not in so marked a degree as in the case of my mother, as she was a victim of long standing."

PRESIDENT TAFT STARTS ON HIS TOUR OF WEST AND SOUTH

Thirteen Thousand Mile Journey Begun---He Will Meet President Diaz at the Mexican Border--Trip to Take Two Months

Beverly, Mass., Sept. 15.—President William H. Taft to-day stepped into a motor car, waved a cheerful good-by and started for Boston, where this evening he boards a private car and begins a tour of the west and south that will be the most remarkable trip ever taken by a president of the United States. The route of about 13,000 miles has been carefully mapped out, and every arrangement is perfected. The fact that to-day is Mr. Taft's fifty-second birthday anniversary was taken as a happy augury for the success of the long journey.

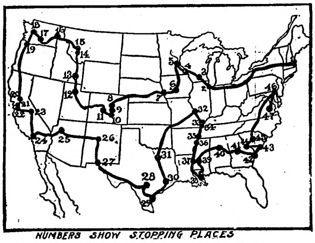
Shortly before noon to-morrow, the president will arrive in Chicago and be the guest of the Commercial club at luncheon. Next, the Hamilton club takes him in charge and will escort him, with a bodyguard of 1,000 members, to the West side ball park, to witness a game between Chicago and New York. After that will come a dinner at the Congress hotel, and then a meeting in Orchestra hall, where Mr. Taft will make a speech. To wind up the day, the president will put in his appearance at a reception and ball given by the Chicago bankers in the Auditorium.

In Wisconsin and Minnesota.

Leaving Chicago at 3 a. m. Friday morning, the presidential party will stop at Milwaukee, Madison and Portage, and will spend the night at Winona, Minn., and will reach Minneapolis early on the morning of Saturday, September 18. He will spend all Saturday and Sunday in Minneapolis and St. Paul, leaving Sunday night at eight o'clock in order to reach Des Moines on the morning of September 20.

Five hours will be spent in the Iowa capital, where Mr. Taft will review 5,000 troops of the regular army and make a speech, and then the president moves on to Omaha, where he will spend the late afternoon and evening.

Denver will be reached the afternoon of September 21, and the president will go almost direct from his train to the state capitol for a reception to be tendered by state officials, by the chamber of commerce and civic organizations. At 9 p. m. the president will make an address in the Denver Auditorium, where Mr. Bryan last year was nominated for the presidency.



President Taft's Route Through West and South.

The president and his party will breakfast with Thomas F. Walsh, at Wolhurst, near Denver, the morning of Wednesday, September 22, and then return to the city for the chamber of commerce banquet at noon.

Leaving Denver at 5 p. m., September 22, the president and his party will stop for an hour's visit at Colorado Springs, and then go on to Pueblo, where in the evening they will be guests at the state fair.

In Wonder Region of Colorado.

The morning of September 23 will find the president at Glenwood Springs for a brief visit and that afternoon he will visit Montrose, where he will formally open the great Gunnison river tunnel built by the government for the irrigation of the Uncompahgre valley.

Returning to Grand Junction to resume the journey westward, the president will arrive at Salt Lake City, Utah, Friday afternoon, September 24, to remain there until Sunday afternoon, the twenty-sixth, when the party leaves over the Oregon Short Line for Pocatello, Ida., and Butte, Mont., the latter city being reached Monday, September 27, at 6:40 a. m. John Hays Hammond joins the party at Salt Lake City.

After spending half a day in Butte, there will be a brief excursion into Helena. Spokane, Wash., will be reached early Thursday morning, the twenty-eighth, and the entire day will be spent in that city.

The forenoon of the twenty-ninth will be spent at North Yakima and the party will arrive at Seattle at 8:15 that evening.

Two Days at Seattle Exposition.

President Taft will spend two days—September 30 and October 1—"doing" the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific exposition, leaving Seattle late in the evening of the second day and arriving at Portland, Ore., October 2 at 7 a. m.

Two days will be spent in Portland, the party leaving there at 6 p. m. Sunday, October 3, for a trip down the famous Shasta route, through the Siskilyou mountains and in view of Mount Shasta, to San Francisco.

The president will stop the evening of October 4 at Sacramento, reaching Oakland, Cal., early on the morning of October 5. He will spend four or five hours in and around Oakland and Berkeley before taking the ferry at 12:30 o'clock for San Francisco.

After spending the afternoon and evening of the fifth in San Francisco the president will leave early the morning of the sixth for the Yosemite valley.

The president will spend Monday and Tuesday, October 11 and 12, in Los Angeles visiting his sister.

Will Meet President Diaz.

He will arrive at the Grand canyon the morning of October 14 and will leave again that night for Albuquerque, N. M., where he will spend the evening of the fifteenth, reaching El Paso early the following morning for the meeting with President Diaz of Mexico.

President Diaz will arrive from Mexico City at Ciudad Juarez about the same time and he will then cross the frontier and meet President Taft at El Paso. An hour later the president of the United States will return the visit to President Diaz at Ciudad Juarez on the Mexican side. The authorities of the latter city have appropriated $20,000 for decorations and a bull fight.

Ariving at Corpus Christi the evening of October 18, the president will go at once to his brother's ranch, where he will spend Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday. Charles P. Taft has had golf links built on the ranch.

Trip Down Mississippi River.

Visiting Houston the forenoon of Saturday, October 23, the president will proceed to Dallas that afternoon to spend Saturday evening and all Sunday.

He will reach St. Louis at 7:27 a. m. the morning of Monday, October 25, and will leave at 4 p. m. on the steamer assigned to him by the Deep Waterways association, which is to hold its convention in New Orleans on the presidents arrival there.

Following the president's boat will be a spectacular flotilla of river craft. One of the trailing boats will be assigned to make the trip down the river and to attend the convention. Another boat will be assigned to the congressional delegation of more than 100 members. Yet another boat will carry members of the Illinois Manufacturers' association.

During his stay in St. Louis the president will breakfast at the Commercial club, will make an address at 11 a. m. in the Coliseum, will lunch at the Jefferson hotel as the guest of the Business Men's league, and before boarding the steamer at 4 p. m. will make a brief visit to East St. Louis, Ill.

First Stop of Voyage at Cairo.

The first long stop of the river trip will be at Cairo at 8:30 a. m. Tuesday, October 2[illegible]. The second stop will be at Hickman, Ky., at 2:30 p. m., the president making brief addresses at both places.

Arriving off Memphis, Tenn., at 8 a. m. Wednesday, October 27, the president will make an address at 9 o'clock and that afternoon a 5 o'clock will speak at Helena, Ark.

On Thursday, October 28, at 2:30 p. m., Mr. Taft will make a speech at Vicksburg. New Orleans will be reached about four o'clock Friday afternoon. The river journey also will include short stops at Cape Girardeau, Mo., and Natches, Miss.

The president will remain in New Orleans from Friday afternoon, the twenty-ninth, to Monday morning, November 1. He will address the Waterways convention on October 30 at 2:30 p. m.

From New Orleans the president will go to Jackson and Columbus, Miss.; Birmingham, Ala.; Macon, Savannah, Charleston, Augusta, Wilmington and Richmond, reaching Washington November 10.

Physicians Recommend Castoria

CASTORIA has met with pronounced favor on the part of physicians, pharmaceutical societies and medical authorities. It is used by physicians with results most gratifying. The extended use of Castoria is unquestionably the result of three facts: First—The indisputable evidence that it is harmless: Second—That it not only allays stomach pains and quiets the nerves, but assimilates the food: Third—It is an agreeable and perfect substitute for Castor Oil. It is absolutely safe. It does not contain any Opium, Morphine, or other narcotic and does not stupefy. It is unlike Soothing Syrups, Bateman's Drops, Godfrey's Cordial, etc. This is a good deal for a Medical Journal to say. Our duty, however, is to expose danger and record the means of advancing health. The day for poisoning innocent children through greed or ignorance ought to end. To our knowledge, Castoria is a remedy which produces composure and health, by regulating the system—not by stupefying it—and our readers are entitled to the information.—Hall's Journal of Health.

Letters from Prominent Physicians addressed to Chas. H. Fletcher.

Dr. B. Halstead Scott, of Chicago, Ills., says: "I have prescribed your Castoria often for infants during my practice, and find it very satisfactory."

Dr. William Belmont, of Cleveland, Ohio, says: "Your Castoria stands first in its class. In my thirty years of practice I can say I never have found anything that so filled the place."

Dr. J. H. Taft, of Brooklyn, N. Y., says: "I have used your Castoria and found it an excellent remedy in my household and private practice for many years. The formula is excellent."

Dr. R. J. Hamlen, of Detroit, Mich., says: "I prescribe your Castoria extensively, as I have never found anything to equal it for children's troubles. I am aware that there are imitations in the field, but I always see that my patients get Fletcher's."

Dr. Wm. J McCrann, of Omaha, Neb., says: "As the father of thirteen children I certainly know something about your great medicine, and aside from my own family experience I have in my years of practice found Castoria a popular and efficient remedy in almost every home."

Dr. J. R. Clausen, of Philadelphia, Pa., says: "The name that your Castoria has made for itself in the tens of thousands of homes blessed by the presence of children, scarcely needs to be supplemented by the endorsement of the medical profession, but I, for one, most heartily endorse it and believe it an excellent remedy."

Dr. R. M. Ward, of Kansas City, Mo., says: "Physicians generally do not prescribe proprietary preparations, but in the case of Castoria my experience, like that of many other physicians, has taught me to make an exception. I prescribe your Castoria in my practice because I have found it to be a thoroughly reliable remedy for children's complaints. Any physician who has raised a family, as I have, will join me in heartiest recommendation of Castoria."

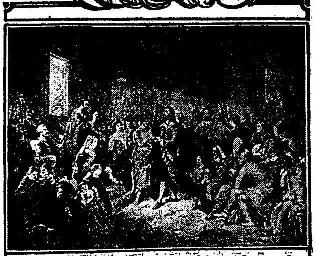
PHANTASM of JAMESTOWN'S FAMINE

BY EDWARD B. CLARK

COPYRIGHT, 1909, BY W. A. PATTERSON



MARRIAGE OF POCAHONTAS

WASHINGTON.—In Washington there is a little organization of men who call themselves "The Survivors of the Jamestown Famine." This little society has no incorporation papers and it has no legal existence, its members being bound together simply by the ties of friendship, knitted close as a result of a pleasure excursion made four years ago to the site of the old city of Jamestown in the James river, a few miles back from the coast. The society was the outgrowth of a pleasure trip of which Representative William B. McKinley of Illinois was the leader and host.

The Survivors include an even dozen of congressmen and another even dozen of newspaper men. From the time that they took their trip southeastward from the capital they have met together occasionally to eat and drink of the good things of earth and to live over in memory their terrible experiences during the famine. Now those who have dug into history know that the old Jamestown colony suffered terribly from hunger and that many of the colonists died of starvation. The members of congress and the newspaper men who went to Jamestown were so well provided with the good things of life that they feasted most of the time while on their journeying. So it was with a touch of irony and of humor that the excursionists on their return concluded to call themselves "The Survivors of the Jamestown Famine."

The Survivors meet several times during the continuance of each congressional session and they invite high officials to their feasts, and the high officials, with plates and glasses well filled before them hear the pathetic story of the terrible experience that their hosts underwent while making the round trip to Jamestown in a year gone by. It is just a bit of fun, but it serves its purpose of keeping companionable men together and of giving the excuse for two or three moderate feasting occasions during the time that congress is wrestling with legislative problems.

The Survivors have visited Jamestown and the places near it, which are laden with historical interest, a number of times since their first journeying forth. They know to-day more about the old Virginia coast cities than it falls to the lot of most men who live at a distance to know.

Some of the information stored away in the breasts of the Survivors is unburdened on the guests who assemble at each successive feasting. It is real information, and perhaps it is not without its interest.

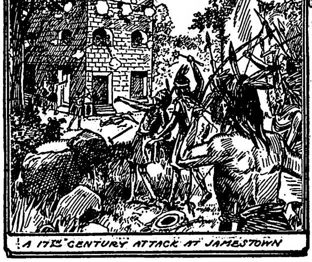
The old city of Jamestown was situated 40 miles up the broad James river. There is no village to-day at Jamestown, nor even a hamlet, but the visitor to the region who fails to make a pilgrimage to the site of the place "that once was" fails in a duty to himself and to the spirit of things ancient.

The old city of Jamestown has been turned over to the tender mercies of the government and to the tenderer mercies of the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities, and the mercies in evidence are manifold. The government has built a breakwater to save the island from the ravages of the river and the Antiquities society is hard at work saving the ruins that remain to mark the birthplace of English civilization in America.

There is a church tower on the site of the old settlement that is sturdy in its very decay and no poor monument to the builders of the early seventeenth century. Sitting in the shadow of this tower you can call up enough shades of the past to make an interesting company. Some of the shades must come from a distance, but here in the body they lived and did those things that made their memories a people's inheritance.

Close to the place where the church ruin rises Capt. John Smith gathered the settlers about him and told them the story of the saving of his life by the Indian princess, Pocahontas. Captain John had been in the kingdom of Powhatan to beg or borrow food for his hungry fellows. He had more tales than one to tell, but the Pocahontas story was the day's prime recital.

John was a touchy man on points of honor and no doubt his story was received straight-faced by his listeners, but one would like to have been present when the captain was safely retired to the fireside. The first romantic Pocahontas episode is put aside to-day by those who make a business of destroying things in history that the sentimental world holds dearest, but it is just as well to say here that no visitor valuing his comfort of mind and body should cast a stone of doubt at the literal truth of the John Smith tale. The Virginians of to-day are as sensitive about their early history as the doughty captain was about his honor.



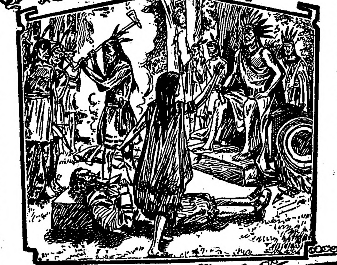
A 17TH CENTURY ATTACK AT JAMESTOWN

Powhatan's daughter was baptized according to the faith of the English church within a few rods of the crumbling tower. She had been captured by one Capt. Argall, who probably took little stock in the other captain's story that the Indian maiden had "hazarded the beating out of her own brains to save his." At any rate the Jamestown people held Pocahontas as prisoner and hostage and converted her to their faith. She was baptized in a church of which to-day there is small vestige left and afterward she was married to John Rolfe in the same sanctuary.

If you desire to bring back the shade of Pocahontas as she looked in life as a child, read Capt. Smith's description of her as he saw her the day he said she saved his life. Here it is: "A child of 10 years old, which for feature, countenance and proportion much exceedeth any of the rest of Powhatan's people."

Excavations have been made recently at Jamestown and the visitor will find much that was hidden from the visitor of the past. Some of the old gravestones have been resurrected and restored and one may read the names of a few of those who died in the famine time, or who met death in the early and almost constant warfare with the Indians. The "God's acre" that outlies the old church tower is in a fair state of preservation and it holds an interest in no way second to the interest attaching to the old graveyard at Plymouth, Mass., even though, for reasons not thoroughly understood, the rock of Plymouth has overshadowed the island of the James through all the years of American history.

Originally Jamestown island was a peninsula, but the river has carried many acres of the land down to the sea, cutting a channel through and isolating the site of the settlement. Material for the repair of history was washed away to the sea, but much remains by means of which the past may be repatched.



THE RESCUE OF CAPTAIN JOHN SMITH

The first representative assembly in America met at Jamestown before the pilgrim fathers landed at Plymouth. It is but a step from the old church tower to the site of the first church which the colonists built and in which the house of burgesses met.

Later a "statehouse" was constructed, and recently, during the work of excavation, the foundationtions of the building were turned up. Near the site of the assembly house the visitor to-day can trace the outlines of the governor's mansion by means of the basic wall which once upheld its superstructure. The settlers' powder magazine, their mainstay of defense, has been preserved in part, though the restless river is trying daily to claim it as it has claimed much before.

The church whose tower still stands was built in 1620. Through the doorway, which is open to visitors, the colonists led to the marriage altar the "respectable maidens sent over the seas to become the wives of the forlorn settlers who, up to this date, had struggled on without helpmates as best they could, and who now for the payment of 120 pounds of tobacco might pick and choose a wife." On that day in Jamestown Rev. Robert Hunt, or his successor, for history is not clear on the point, held a veritable marriage feast, and fat were the fees paid to him in the coin of the time—the long-leaved Virginia tobacco. A recent visitor thought of that marriage procession as he stood under the tower and he wondered how many of the descendants of the settlers and of the "respectable maidens" have journeyed here to look on the place of their ancestors' marrying.

Jamestown was deserted early as years go, but its memories never will desert it. The visitor asked if there were no tangible memorials of Pocahontas in existence and was told that the baptismal font used at her baptism is preserved in Bruton church, Williamsburg, which became the Virginia capital when Jamestown was abandoned. The Pocahontas font has served to hold the baptismal waters of generations of Virginians, and the Bruton church wardens lay great store by it, but when the old Jamestown church is restored there will be ample justification for stealing the sacred vessel to put it back where it belongs.

There are three stories of the Jamestown church tower. In the first story are doorways, arched windows are in one part of the second story and loopholes are in the third story, and to these last the greatest interest attaches. The loopholes appear on all sides of the tower and they were used as embrasures for protruding cannon in times of Indian attack. Figures are dry things at best, but it is worth noting that this tower remnant of an early wilderness edifice is 18 feet square and 36 feet high. The structure is crumbling at the top, but the work of the preservation society will make it all secure.

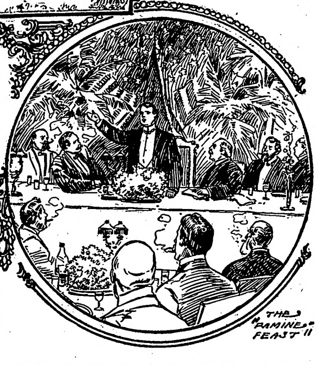
It is only three miles across country—and a bit of water—from Jamestown island to Williamsburg. Jamestown is largely memory, while Williamsburg is both memory and reality. The past and the present meet in its streets and there is a subtle blending of the two into a midtime atmosphere. Happily the Virginians have held to the love of the old things. It is worth something to know that the main street still is known—see the corner signs—as the Duke of Gloucester street. It is a noble thoroughfare, whatever may be said of the one for whom it was named, and on it stands a courthouse designed by Sir Christopher Wren. There are things worth while in Williamsburg.

At the site of Jamestown the visitor is told that the baptismal font that held the water that washed Pocahontas' heathenism out of her had been taken to Williamsburg. There it is in the old Bruton church and it still holds its age and water well.

Bruton church, by the way, is also on the Duke of Gloucester street, and it is an appealing structure. Whoever the architect was, he has the spirit which makes for beauty. The building is clad with the ivy of England, which grows and thrives in this latitude. The churchyard, as quiet as that of the "Elegy," lies along its walls. It is supposed that the church was named by one of the earlier secretaries of the colony, who was born in Bruton, England.

In the churchyard is a tomb with this inscription:

"Under this marble lieth the body of Thomas Ludwell; Esqr., Secretary of Virginia, who was born at Bruton, in the county of Somerset, in the Kingdom of England, and departed this life in the year 1678."



THE "FAMINE" FEAST

Close to the north door of the church are the graves of two children of Mrs. Martha Custis, who, when widowed, became the wife of George Washington. It is not the intention to make a necrology of this writing, but it is barely possible that these two inscriptions, which appear on tablets inside the Bruton church, extolling the virtues of the dead, may have a living interest. Here is one of them:

"Near this marble lyes ye Honble. Danel Paeke, of ye county of Essex, Esqr., who was one of his masters counsellors and sometime Secretary of the Collony of Virga. He dyed ye 6th of March, Anno 1679. His other felecityes were crowned by his happy marridg with Rebecka, the daughter of George Evelyn, of the County of Surry, Esqr. She dyed ye 2nd of January, Anno 1672, at Long Ditton, in ye County of Surry, and left behind her a most hopeful progeny."

The other tablet bears this:

"MDCCLII. Inscribed to the memory of Doctor William Cocke, an English physician, born of reputable parents MDCLXXI., at Sudbury in Suffolk, and educated at Queen's College, Cambridge. He was learned and polite, of undisputed skill in his profession and unbounded generosity in his practice, which multitudes yet alive can testify. He was many years of the Council, and Secretary of State for this Colony in the reign of Queen Anne and of King George. He died suddenly, sitting a judge upon the bench of the General Court, in the capitol, MDCCXX. His Hon. friend Alexr. Spottswood, Esqr., then Govnr., with the principal gentlemen of the country, attended his funeral, and weeping, saw the corpse interred at the west end of the alter in this church."

Almost in the shadow of Bruton church stands the Wythe house, for some time the headquarters of George Washington during the siege of Yorktown, which, with its historic memories, lies only a few miles away. The seeds of history were sown thick hereabouts.

Just back of the church and at a point easily reached from the Duke of Gloucester street, stands the old "Powder Horn," built by Governor Spottswood in 1714. This magazine, put up by a British governor, was used afterward by Washington to store powder, which subsequently was rammed into cannon to hurl shot at Cornwallis behind the breastworks of Yorktown. The Virginia Society for the Preservation of Antiquities has restored the Powder Horn, and it is now a museum for relics of the past.

It is hard work to get away from Williamsburg, for there is something holding interest at every turn of the streets and the lanes with the ancient and high-sounding names. A resident of the town said that five presidents had worshiped in the Bruton church and the visitor didn't want to get away until he had seen where they all sat, so fast had the spirit of the old place laid its hand on him.

If a loyal Williamsburger lends his sight-seeing aid you will not be allowed to leave the "oldest incorporated city in America" until you have visited the College of William and Mary, which stands at the head of the Duke of Gloucester street—you can't leave this thoroughfare in the lurch if you try—and which is the oldest college in America, barring only Harvard. The little guidebook of the place tells that among the alumni of "this ancient and honorable college" may be numbered three presidents of the United States, 12 cabinet officers, 19 members of the continental congress, among them its first president, Peyton Randolph; four justices of the supreme court of the United States, including Chief Justice Marshall, together "with a long list of senators, United States envoys and ministers, governors, military and naval officers and five signers of the declaration of independence." The thought on reading the graduate list was that the last ought to have come first.

The half hasn't been told of this old Virginia town. The blunt truth is that when you get into one of these history-teeming places you are lost in wonder that so many things worth remembering by posterity could have happened and that so many men could have had a hand in their happening. They made history fast in Virginia and they made plenty of it.

Not long ago an officer of one of the staff departments of the United States army was made a brigadier-general of the line. A younger officer sneered at the promotion and said that the president was recognizing hard duty done in the cracker and cheese department, while the fellows who fought were overlooked.

Some of the officers of the staff departments of the army have seen as much service on stricken fields as have many of their fellows of the line. Col. Thomas Cruse is doing duty in the quartermaster's department, and he takes more account of shovels than he does of swords, but it would be a bold man of the line who would sneer at the career of Col. Cruse.

The colonel saw all kinds of service before he made the transfer to the staff and one of his exploits is told to-day in Sibley tents and in barracks wherever United States troops are camped or quartered.

Cruse was for years an officer in the Sixth cavalry. They say to-day when he picks up a sample shovel in the quartermaster's department he handles it as though it were a carbine. In the early summer of the year 1882 Second Lieut. Cruse was serving in "K" troop of the Sixth down in one of the hottest parts of hot Arizona. That was a time when the people in Arizona had no hankering after statehood. There were not as many of them as there are to-day and, as an Irishman might put it, they had their hands full dodging Apache arrows and bullets.

There is a place in Arizona called the Big Dry Wash—a curious name, but one fitting a creek bed in a rainless region. Second Lieut. Cruse was sent out with a following of six men one day on the trail of a band of Apaches. There were not enough troops in the country at that time and commands were divided and subdivided in order to cover the greatest amount of territory possible and to the end of discovering where the reds had rendezvoused, so that the scattered soldiers, when the discovery was made, might be gathered together and a descent be made upon the enemy in a body.

Lieut. Cruse and his little following reached the Big Dry Wash without finding the sign of an Apache. Beyond the basin of the Wash was a natural fortification of rocks. Cruse sent a trooper by the right flank to make a reconnoisance before ordering his men to cross the bare bed of the gulch. The trooper made a detour and took a peep behind the bowlders. He returned and reported that there wasn't an Indian in sight.

Then the little command, Cruse leading, pushed down into the basin and hell opened from behind the rocks to their front. Two of the seven saddles were emptied at the first volley and under the sharp order of their leader the soldiers gave way and sought the shelter of the rocks to the rear.

Lieut. Cruse did not obey his own order. He waited and in the face of the showering bullets he lifted a wounded trooper to his saddle and bore him back to shelter.

It was supposed that the second trooper who had fallen at the first fire of the Apaches was dead. Cruse looked out across the waste between him and the ambushed savages, the strength of whose fire told him that they outnumbered his squad 10 to one. While looking in the direction of the enemy Cruse saw the first trooper who had fallen turn himself on the sand. Then there happened one of those things which official army history disposes of in a line, but to which a chapter can scarce do justice.

Cruse, carbine in hand, stood up a fair and easy mark for a bullet. In an instant a red face showed above a rock beyond the stream bed and a rifle barrel appeared, aimed in the direction of the cavalryman. Before the weapon cracked Cruse, one of the best shots in the army, had sent a bullet through the Apache's head.

Then this second lieutenant—he was little more than a boy—rounded the rocks in front of him and walked straight across the open toward the wounded soldier. At every third step he fired and the bullets rattled on the rocks close to the heads of the lurking reds, who had seen their comrade's head split clean at a hundred and fifty yeards, and with that savage discretion which at times takes the place of savage courage, they did not dare show themselves sufficiently to take careful aim.

Cruse reached the wounded trooper. Then he glanced behind him. Two of his men had followed him, all unbidden. "Carry him, boys," said Cruse, "and I'll cover the retreat."

Back they went slowly. A savage braver than his fellows stood up, took careful aim at the group and fired. The bullet hit Cruse in the arm, but an ounce of lead from his carbine crashed into the Apache's chest. Cruse walked backward, while behind him his two troopers bore their stricken fellow.

Bullets marked all the pathway, but the magnificent nerve and courage of the soldier, who shot true with death staring him in the face, seemed to palsy the Apache's aim. They reached the breastworks, the officer, and the soldiers with their burden. Before taking to cover Cruse sent one last shot and it claimed a victim.

In an hour reinforcements came and a horde of savages was put to flight. Col. Cruse is in the quartermaster's department, but there are hundreds of older officers of the line who would like to have his record.

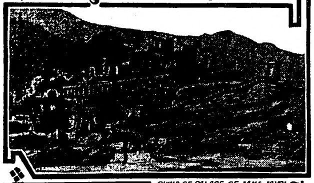
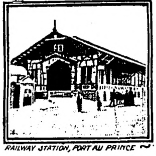
VOL. IX. SUNBEAM, RED LAKE COUNTY, MINNESOTA, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1909. NO. 26.

HAYTI, COUNTRY OF WARFARE



RUINS OF PALACE OF SANS SOUCI



RAILWAY STATION, PORT AU PRINCE

Considering the tempestuous career which Hayti has had since the brave Toussaint L'Ouverture helped lead his countrymen in revolt against the French, it is a pity that more men of his calibre haven't been able to dominate that beautiful island of the Caribbean. Since it threw off the French yoke in 1804 it has had 20 presidents, and easily five times as many near presidents, to say nothing of scores and scores and hundreds and hundreds of politicians who would like to sit in the administration building. Life is cheaper in Hayti than in almost any other country in the world. Of these 20 presidents, 16 have been deposed by violence.

Hayti threw off the rule of France in 1804. That was the time of Toussaint L'Ouverture, celebrated in poetry and otherwise known as a great Haytian general. But the greatest of them all at that time—at all events the most powerful of them all—was Dessalines. The French removed L'Ouverture to a Parisian dungeon, but Dessalines outwitted them. In the hostilities that ended in the withdrawal of the French he won sufficient glory and power to enable him to proclaim himself eternal emperor of his people. His strength lasted hardly long enough for him to get used to the royal position. A party of his numerous enemies caught him in ambush one day and that was the end of Dessalines. He became, however, a great popular hero in the Haytian legends. Even to-day his picture, next to that of Gen. Simon, is the best known in the island.

The method by which Dessalines met his death established one of the most enduring traditions in Hayti. Nord Alexis managed to make his escape the other day, and being very old—80 or thereabouts—may be lucky enough to die a natural death. That outcome, however, is more or less problematical. As for Gen. Simon, it may be safely predicted that one of his enemies will sooner or later conspire successfully to put an end to him. In the history of home rule in Hayti, few rulers have passed away as most other people pass away.

Christophe, who succeeded Dessalines, had such a hard time of it that he lost all patience with the situation, went mad and killed himself. Then came a Gen. Boyer, a dashing figure in the history of Haytian revolutions. On his assumption of the highest executive power on the island, he announced that he was there for life. The legislative branches agreed with him, until Gen. Herard and his following became too conspicuous to ignore. Whereupon Boyer was driven out of the country—exiled for life.

Gen. Herard had hardly time to know what his epaulettes looked like when Gen. Guerrier came into prominence. Gen. Herard followed his predecessor by the same route, as it were—that is, exile.

Then followed a period of additional turmoil. Hayti was overrun with ambitious generals who sought to tread in Dessaline's footsteps. One, more powerful than the others, a man named Riche, had himself elected for life. In 1847 he was exiled. His successor, Gen. Soulouque, took unto himself the title of emperor. In 1859 he, too, fled aboard ship and passed the remainder of his life beyond the boundaries of the island.

Hayti then went back to the republican form of government. Gen. Geffrard made himself president "for life," as the proclamation read. In 1867 he disappeared into exile and a dictator by the name of Gen. Salnave began to rule the island. He proved to be quite unendurable, and in 1869 was shot by order of court-martial. Gen. Domingue succeeded him.

These were more than usually tempectuous times in the black republic, and Domingue's life was always in jeopardy. In 1876 the place became so hot for him that, like Nord-Alexis, he fled.

Gen. Boisrond-Canal, who passed into the government palace shortly after the exit of Domingue, encountered about as much open hostility as any Haytian ruler of recent times.

His successor, Gen. Solomon, came into office under uncertain conditions which, during his term of occupancy, underwent no change toward betterment. Two rival candidates for the presidency there were, one Gen. Legitime, the other Gen. Hyppolite, and between them they made things warm for Solomon. The latter fancied, if one may accept certain pronunciamentos, that he was president of Hayti for life. To further that ambition he swept the mailed fist this way and that. Meanwhile, Legitime and Hyppolite were as active as hornets. From this country went several expeditions to their aid, and they gave Washington so much annoyance that Secretary Bayard was at one time almost on the point of intervening and putting an end to Haytian disorders.

Gen. Legitime eventually got together enough recruits to make a brave show in front of Port au Prince. Solomon held out as long as his army would remain with him, and then, like Domingue and the others, he fled the country. Whereupon Legitime crowned himself president, hopeful of remaining in position for life.

Meanwhile in the north of the country, Gen. Hyppolite, disappointed because he had not accomplished as much as Legitime, held on to his personal following and set about to keep up the disturbances. Legitime surrounded himself, but there were defections from his ranks and in spite of the iron heel, Hyppolite gained favor. When the rebel army was almost within shouting distance of Port au Prince, Legitime decided that he had better be thinking of what his predecessors had done. It all ended on his departure and Hyppolite's assumption of chief authority on the island.

A stern rule was Hyppolite's then for a period of seven years. He had all sorts of intrigue to deal with, but with an experience of half a century of similar intrigue to aid him, he managed somewhat better than the usual Haytian executive. Moreover he had the troops with him.

Characterized by his following as a mild-mannered old man Hyppolite was a first-rate successor of Christophe, Domingue, Soulouque, Salnave. He was at the time of the Corpus Christi massacre a man of about 60 years, coal black in color.

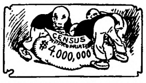
Withal he managed to make a pretty able president of the island. Foreign governments found him considerably more tractable than his predecessors or for that matter his immediate successor, Mr. Simon Sam. He was particularly pleasant to Americans, professed a strong faith in American institutions, and often remarked that he wished it were possible to give Hayti the same sort of freedom.

T. Simon Sam, who had been minister of war in Hyppolite's cabinet, then went into office. He, too, began to have troubles. He attempted to give his country a peaceful reign, and got along pretty well until his finances became tangled. There was a loss of over a million dollars, and the scandal grew and grew until in 1902, thanks to the energy of Nord Alexis, the government was forced to acknowledge the deficit. Sam fled the country.

Nord Alexis brought into vogue again the strong arm method of dispensing punishment. The fact that he was an old man gave his enemies more hope than otherwise they would have had. Indeed, ever since he has been sitting in the administration building they have been hatching plots to get rid of him.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Taking New Census Will Be Big Task



WASHINGTON.—It will require about 65,000 enumerators to take the thirteenth decennial census of the United States, and Uncle Sam is going to pay $4,000,000 for the service. These enumerators, appointed by 330 supervisors throughout the country, will begin work April 15, 1910.

Between the time of their appointment and the commencement of actual work, the enumerators will be schooled in the method of enumeration and the preparation of the schedules. The custom heretofore has been for the census bureau to send out sample schedules for the enumerators to fill in.

For the last two months economists, scientists and farming experts have been at work on schedules involving population, manufactures, and particularly agriculture. It is estimated by the census bureau that fully 6,000,000 farms will be enumerated with a population of more than 12,000,000 to be collected by the enumerators.

Each enumerator is to receive for his work from two to four cents per capita, and in some regions where there is not much density of population they are to receive a per diem of from four to five dollars. Enumerators are required to work eight hours a day and must have their work completed in two weeks in cities of 5,000 and over, and in sparsely settled communities within 30 days.

In districts where foreign languages are spoken it will be the duty of supervisors to select enumerators versed in foreign languages if possible, and where these are not available, the services of interpreters may be engaged.

Wishing Tree Where Wishes Come True

AH WISH DAT POLICY NUMBER AH PLAYED WOULD WIN

HAVE you ever sat under the benign shade of Washington's wishing tree?

It has been one of the unique attractions of Lafayette park for, lo, these many years. It is not described in the official guide books, but it is there just the same, and has been ever since the square was laid out—in the forties. The tree itself is a dwarf chestnut, although it has grown out of its dwarfness to a great extent. It is a scion of the famous wishing tree in Hyde park, London. It is located immediately west of the Jackson statue, about 25 feet, and is in full sight of all the windows on the north side of the White House.

The wishing tree, as its name indicates, possesses rare powers, or at least it is supposed to, in that every wish that is made under its branches comes true some time or other. Generally it is other, but that does not seriously interfere with the reputation of the tree.

There were more believers in the tree some years ago than there are now, but that does not mean that there are not a great many who believe in it to-day. Nor is the number by any means confined to the old "mammies," "aunties" and other black folk. Ninety-nine per cent. of the persons who pass under the tree on their way through the square probably never heard or read of it. But there are others, and in this case there are a great many others.

The most marvelous stories are told about the tree, and many of the stories have believers. Also many of stories have some element of truth about them. In many cases it is a great deal of story and a very minute particle of truth. But it is because there is some truth in them that the tree has such a clientele.

Faith does not cure all the ills that it is asked to cure, but its followers are sure that it cures in some instances. Hence there are faith cures. The thousands of wishes that are made under the wishing tree may end up in only one coming true, but the wisher who has been rewarded by its favor never loses an opportunity to sing its prasises, and that is what makes the wishing tree so much more famous than any of the other trees that are in the same park.

Rare Curios Fill Home of Minister

SWISS EMBASSY

"MINISTRE de Suisse, Washington, D. C." was the simple label neatly stamped on an immense box which caused no little curiosity and speculation as to its contents as it passed slowly through the streets of that city on its way to the abode of the new Swiss minister.

The minds of the spectators were set at ease by Paul Ritter, the Swiss minister, when he told them that the box contained furniture, and that there were 15 more coming.

Furniture and house furnishings collected by Mr. Ritter during the 18 years of his diplomatic career in the far east were to be found in the boxes.

The minister's residence will abound with these rare curios and odd art treasures collected in the Orient. The walls and windows will be embellished by rich embroideries of China, Japan, India, Korea and other far eastern countries.

There will be rare old gilt wood carvings from Buddhist temples placed in the dining-room; old Japanese candlesticks of exaggerated design will be suspended from the chandelieres; coal buckets will be made out of century-old and fancy-wrought designs of incense burners; woven camel's hair curtains for the front windows are among the collection.

When all the goods are set in place the legation will be unique, and one entering its doors might well harbor the illusion that he is entering a home in some far eastern land.

Every article in the collection has some highly prized association to the minister personally, or to his family, and his household goods, he says, are priceless.

Uncle Sam Urges Campaign on Rodents

RAT CLUBS and other societies for systematic warfare on destructive rodents may leap into popular favor among housekeepers, now that the government has officially sanctioned this method of extermination of the worst mammal pest in the United States.

The rat has been recognized by the government as a problem. Its activity in disseminating infectious diseases has long loomed up as a danger signal to the health authorities, and losses from its depredations run into many million dollars a year, according to an official statement just issued by the department of agriculture.

Dr. David E. Lants of the bureau of biological survey has taken vigorous hold of the question, and thus he proceeds to throw a bomb into the camp of believers in the cat as a rat destroyer.

"However valuable cats may be as mousers, few of them learn to catch rats. The ordinary house cat is too well fed and consequently too lazy to undertake the capture of any animal as formidable as the brown rat. Birds are much more to its liking.

"Rats have developed so much intelligence and such extraordinary caution that attempts to exterminate them have rerely succeeded. The failures have been due not so much to a lack of effective methods as a lack of certain precautions and absence of concerted action."

The department in a bulletin emphasizes the importance of rat clubs and suggests that interest in organized rat hunts may be stimulated by offering prizes or rewards in various communities to the individual hauling forth the greatest number of dead rats after one of the crusades.

AMERICAN GIRLS IN PARIS

THE GRECIAN URN RITUAL

Five of these girls are Americans.

The Paris garden where they exercise belongs to one of our older American fortunes, made by an honest westerner years ago, while uplifting the tastes of his fellow-citizens. The granddaughter of the man who owned opera houses has gone beyond the Italian operas that pleased his generation, but something of the beautiful old gestures remain fixed in her ideal.

The girls' names may not be given—it is promised—but their search for grace and cultured ease, apart from beauty, reveals a tendency of the hour among the rich and fashionable that must deeply interest all women.

These fair Americans in Paris seek something more attractive than beauty; at least, something without which mere beauty fails to hold. With it the average girl may triumph. And the average girl may acquire it.

Grace! It is becoming more and more recognized as essential, not only to know how to walk and sit, but to possess that personal grace of attitude and movement which the nineteenth century neglected. In renaissance paintings and in old Greek and Indian reliefs we recognize that we are extremely ugly in our movements.

Why should not the poses of artists' models be natural to us? It is part of a curious nineteenth century shame to be found "affected" or "putting on airs;" yet the same considerations ought to forbid women changing their gowns with the fashion or men cultivating formal politeness. To the country jay the city man is "affected."

But the nineteenth century is past and one courageous American girl has shown how the world craves a return to grace. Isadora Duncan's success is not of the stage alone. Paris society goes to her for private lessons.

"It is not to develop bust and biceps by ten minutes' rational exercise each morning," explained one girl. "It is not breathing exercises. Physical training makes the instrument; we are learning how to play on it."

The instrument is the perfected body. To acquire grace is to give it a chance to express itself; and I had a pathetic object lesson of the matter in that garden.

I noticed that one of the girls went through her exercises with somber and ferocious enthusiasm; a beautiful girl, but never smiling, never speaking; and the priestess took a tender interest in her. She does not appear in the present photograph.

"Rich and beautiful, that girl is going through a great unhappiness," I was told later. "The man that she cares for has called her a 'stick.' She was a stick. Being rich and beautiful, it never occurred to her to take pains. Dancing, she sprawls over her partner. In ordinary movements she is awkward and negligent. And her dreaded rival is, exactly, a skinny heroine with a plain face, whose one redeeming quality is grace. It is sufficient. The poor relation of a third-class European ambassador, she has diplomatic society of Paris at her feet."

"Charm of manner," I said.

"She is not even intelligent," was the answer. "It is mere physical beauty of movement, charm of pose and gesture."

"And she is beating that rich and beautiful American girl to it?" I mused. It explained the American girl's somber ardor. She is desperately trying to make up for lost time.

I understood the ritual of the old Paris garden. There is nothing far-fetched about costumes or exercises. The girls seek earnestly to enter into the spirit of the ancient Greeks and the renaissance of the time of Botticelli.

Their priestess is an American girl of wide culture and strong nature, writing successful French poetry under a man's name. Another of the coterie traveled to the orient and sat under the sage who continues the revelation of the Bab. The ritual is eclectic, from the Roman pageant of the spring to the Provencal courts of the muses by way of Keats' "Ode to a Grecian Urn."

No pains are too great to throw them back into the old graceful spirit. It is no laughing adventure. Through summer afternoons their songs are accompanied by slow, rhythmic dances. The responses to the priestess are chanted amid studied figures. Draperies weave in and out, arms rise and fall, lithe bodies pose and change and pose, in attitudes learned carefully beforehand.

They copy attitudes from Grecian urns with pain and hesitation. Why not? So the piano player finds her way, awkward and halting; only little by little does practice make those hard notes fall like showers of pearls. So the graces of these earnest girls, at first stiff copies, became natural and free, a poetry of attitude and gesture all their own.

When they quit their classical draperies for tailor suits they take their graces with them into daily life. These solemn rituals become habit, give them—in our careless daily life—a touch of gravity and dignity that surprises and delights young men. So they would have their girls.

"The classical draperies are of importance to impose graceful habits on our bodies," said one girl. "And these ideals are in the air. Fashion itself is coming round to them."

"Really?" I asked. "Has fashion the slightest tendency to corset reform?"

I was astonished by her answer. Remember, these girls are girls of fashion; and fashion has always laughed at corset reform. Corset reform is in the air of Europe, yes; but when I wrote a few months ago that the Roumanian minister of public instruction had prohibited the corset in the highest normal and professional schools as "a permanent obstacle to the development of the body and the normal functions of the organs," I felt, nevertheless, that I was misleading the reader.

What does Roumania count? What does it count that the Bulgarian tsar banishes the corset from "all schools where girls remain up to the age of 17?"

What does it count that all students of Russian lyceums and high schools of music, ballet and beaux arts are ordered to deposit in the cloakroom the cuirass which they wear under the name of "corset," and that the Czar Nicholas, in signing the regulation, added in his own hand that "the development of feminine charms will be the gainer?" It counts nothing that in Scandinavian countries the mass of girls have voluntarily abandoned the corset "through devotion to outdoor sports."

These are unfashionable lands, where the costume of women matters nothing. Even in Paris the otherwise powerful League of Mothers of Families got itself laughed at by taking up corset reform six months ago.

"The great dressmakers and the corsetmakers themselves can alone make the reform general," they admit. "And the grace movement is forcing them."

The grace movement! Do you smile at it? Do you see anything futile in earnest girls copying the poses and gestures from Grecian urns?

"We pay great prices for Tanagra figurines and I ask why?" one of the girls said. "Why do we so admire them, if not for their grace alone? Their beauty of face and figure is nil. Their beauty of attitude and gesture is everything. It is within the reach of us all. Why not try for it?"

A NEW SCHOOL NEEDED.

The Wright brothers are quoted as saying that they will build an aeroplane for $7,500 for anybody who wants one. Now that they have demonstrated so thoroughly the fine qualities of their machine—its great speed and its birdlike ability to rise and sink while sweeping over hills and valleys, there must be a number of adventurous spirits who would like to own one. The automobilists, whose recreation is interfered with by bad roads and by other vehicles would like to try the smooth and vacant pathways of the air, to fly as the bird flies, and float over the ponds or lakes instead of having to travel around them. There is a practical difficulty as yet, says the Chicago Tribune. No one can buy with the machine the skill to operate it, and there are no aeroplane chauffeurs nor is there any one to teach them. Orville Wright is going abroad to interest foreign governments in the American invention. His brother will teach some army officers how to handle the aeroplane the government has bought of him. After having attended to that he will devote himself to the business of aeroplane construction. Along with that should go the establishment of a school where a capable aviator could give instruction to eager pupils.

And now come dispatches from Winnipeg announcing that the yield of wheat in the prairie provinces of Canada this year will reach 130,000,000 bushels. In the World Almanac for 1909 the whole wheat crop of Canada for 1907 is stated to have been 96,606,000 bushels. This caused some doubt to be expressed as to the authenticity of extracts from a United State's consul's reports as to the increase of wheat production in the northwest provinces which were published during the excitement attending the recent wheat corner. The increase of wheat production in the Canadian northwest has been almost sufficient to stagger belief. It will be a great blessing to the crowded cities of the earth whose cry goes up for bread.

The Russian ministry of commerce has prepared an elaborate plan providing for the general improvement of all the seaports of the empire at a cost of $110,896,237. The amounts which it is planned to expend at Baltic ports aggregate $14,011,862. This is a large amount of money, but Russia will get more in return for it than if she were to spend it all in the race for naval supremacy. Navies can be obtained fast enough when nations are prosperous; and the only way in which prosperity can be secured is by enterprise such as that indicated in the determination to give Russia seaports that will accommodate the commerce of the world.

The announcement from Norway that an electrician of that country has devised a storage battery which solves the problem that Thomas A. Edison has been attacking assiduously for some years past may compel Mr. Edison to bring out the battery whose invention he announced a short time ago. Inventive genius is working along the same lines, and it would not be surprising were the storage batter to come out with several promoters, as did the telephone.

GUNNISON TUNNEL OPENED BY TAFT

Great Reclamation Project Now Is Completed.

BORE IS SIX MILES LONG

Wild Rejoicing at Montrose, Col., as Waters of Mountain River Flow Into the Uncompahgre Valley.

Montrose, Cal., Sept. 23.—Booming of cannon, music of bands and the wild cheering of thousands of men and women to-day signalized the completion of the Gunnison river tunnel project on which the government has been at work for four and a half years. President William H. Taft honored the occasion with his presence and it was his hand that opened the gates at the west portal and admitted into the beautiful but semi-arid Uncompahgre valley the waters of the Gunnison river brought six miles through the immense tunnel that has been driven through a granite mountain range.

The day of the opening of the tunnel was made the chief day of the Western Slope fair, now being held here. All the morning special trains kept coming in, from various parts of the state, and at 10:30 there was a parade of the visitors. Early in the afternoon the explosion of a bomb told the people that the special train bearing President Taft and other government officials had entered the city limits. A second bomb announced his debarkation at the station, and a third was sent up as the distinguished guest, escorted by a great procession, started for Elks' park.

President Taft Welcomed.

At the park, after introductory remarks by F. D. Catlin, chairman of the Gunnison tunnel opening committee, Mayor J. Q. Allen turned the key of the city over to the guests. Then John C. Bell delivered the formal address of welcome, to which President Taft responded briefly and happily. The exercises here concluded with remarks by Senator Charles J. Hughes and Gov. John Shafroth. At four o'clock trains started for the west portal of the tunnel, where President Taft opened the gates, and speeches were made by I. W. McConnell, consulting engineer of the reclamation service, and Senator Horace T. DeLong of Grand Junction.

Story of the Great Tunnel.

First of the big government reclamation projects to be undertaken, the Gunnison river tunnel has been one of the most difficult to carry through. The ample waters of the Gunnison flow through narrow valleys unsuited to agriculture or through deep, rocky canyons, while only a few miles to the west the lovely Uncompahgre valley has been suffering for water. The Gunnison, descending in ever deepening gorges, finally plunges into the Black canyon, one of the most magnificent mountain gorges in the world. This unpromising spot was selected as the starting point of the tunnel. Brave engineers lowered themselves into the Black canyon at points where the granite walls rise almost perpendicularly hundreds of feet, and after their surveys were completed active work was started on the immense project.

At great expense and under enormous difficulties, a wagon road was built to the east portal of the tunnel. It is 15 miles long, and, climbing the granite ridge between the canyon and the Uncompahgre valley, descends the rocky wall on shelf-work.

Bore Built for All Time.

Simultaneously work was begun at each end of the tunnel and at a point several thousand feet from the west end, where a shaft was sunk. As fast as the tunnel was driven through the shale and solid rock, it was timbered, and then the heavy timbers were covered with impervious cement. This gives a tunnel of solid concrete built to withstand the wear of ages. All the flumes, culverts, division gates, drops and other work along the lines of the main canals are built of steel and concrete.

There is no dam across the Black canyon at the point where the river is turned into the tunnel. Instead of this, the tunnel itself taps the river from beneath its granite bed. By this plan neither floods nor slack water can prevent the tunnel taking from the river all the water needed.

Has Immense Capacity.

A few statistics of this tremendous project are worth setting forth. The tunnel is 30,600 feet long, and 11 by 13 feet inside measurement. The main canal is 30 feet wide at the bottom and 82 feet wide at the top, and the average depth of the river is ten feet. The capacity is 1,300 cubic feet of water a second. After the water leaves the west portal of the tunnel it is conducted through 12 miles of canal to the Uncompahgre. There is a drop of 21 feet in this distance, and this great fall will be utilized for creating power. A series of concrete drops has been constructed and the immense body of water rushing over them is capable of generating at least 10,000 horse power, which will be utilized in lighting the entire Uncompahgre valley by electricity.

The cost of the tunnel and distributing canals is over $5,000,000, and perpetual water rights will be sold to actual settlers at about $35 an acre.

MRS. HARRIMAN GETS ALL

RAIL KING'S WILL MAKES WIDOW RICHEST WOMAN.

Last Testament One of Briefest Ever Drawn to Bequeath Such Large Fortune.

New York.—Each of the 100 words in the will of Edward E. Harriman is estimated to be worth $1,000,000 to his widow, Mary W. Harriman, and probably makes her the wealthiest woman in the world.

It is perhaps the briefest will on record for the disposal of an estate of such magnitude. All his property is left to Mrs. Harriman.

Wall street estimates that Mrs. Harriman will inherit in realty and personal property between $75,000,000 and $100,000,000.

Mr. Harriman's private fortune is supposed to have been greater than this by many millions, but there is reason to believe that his unmarried daughters, Mary and Carol, his married daughters, Mrs. Robert Livingstone Gerry, and his two sons, William Averell, and Roland, a boy of 14, together with his surviving sister, Mrs. Simons, and other relatives, have all been substantially provided for in gifts out of hand and trust funds set aside by Mr. Harriman during his lifetime.

The will is witnessed by Charles A. Peabody, president of the Mutual Life Insurance Company, who drew it, and C. C. Tegethoff. Mr. Peabody was Mr. Harriman's close personal friend and was frequently a caller at Arden house during his last illness. He relinquished a law practice commonly estimated as worth $100,000 a year to assume at a smaller salary the executive direction of a company in which Mr. Harriman was heavily interested. Mr. Tegethoff was Mr. Harriman's personal secretary.

On Mrs. Harriman's shoulders will now rest the management of the 43,000 acres of woodland, pasture land and fertile black bottoms in the Ramapo valley and on the steep sides of Tower hill; the completion of the great house on which its master had already lavished $2,600,000 without living to see it finished, and those plans of public benefaction—parks and forest reservations—which it is known that Mr. Harriman cherished, though he makes no mention of them in his will.

Conference on Taxation.

Louisville, Ky.—The third international conference on state and local taxation, under the auspices of the International Tax association, opened Tuesday afternoon in the auditorium of the Seelbach hotel. Forty-three states and five Canadian provinces are represented, and many governors and several premiers are in attendance. In addition there were present numerous state and municipal officials and delegates from universities and colleges.

Eight Die in Train Wreck.

Nashville, Tenn.—As the result of a head-on collision between passenger train No. 4 and fast freight No. 51 on the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis railway one mile west of Pegram Station, Tenn., eight men were killed, one seriously injured and a number of others reported more or less hurt. No passengers were killed. The cars caught fire and several of the victims were cremated.

Chinese Minister on Way.

Peking.—Chang-Yin-Tang, the newly appointed Chinese minister to the United States in succession to Wu Ting-Fang, has left Peking for his post. He expects to reach Washington some time in November.

Bank Robbed of $1,000.

Burlington, Ia.—The First National bank of Stronghurst, Ill., was robbed of $1,000 in money and other valuables, the thieves blowing open the safety deposit vault. The bank safe was not entered.

GOOD ROADS CONVENTION

Men Interested in Improvement of Highways Meet in Cleveland for Three Days' Session.

Cleveland, O.—The second annual national good roads convention began in Chamber of Commerce hall Tuesday, under the auspices of the American Automobile association, the National Grange, the United States office of public roads, several associations of automobile manufacturers and other national bodies interested in highway improvement. About 500 accredited delegates and many other persons are in attendance. Of these a large number came in motor cars. Features of the convention, which will last three days, are practical demonstrations of good road making and an exhibition of road making machinery.

President L. R. Speare of the American Automobile association started off the first session with an opening address, after which the delegates were welcomed by Gov. Harmon and Mayor Johnson. George C. Diehl of Buffalo was the presiding officer. James C. Wonders, state highway commissioner, spoke on "Good Roads in Ohio, and Congressman R. P. Hobson of Alabama on "National Aid and Post Roads." Other speakers were ex-Gov. N. J. Bachelder of New Hampshire, George S. Ladd and James H. McDonald of Connecticut.

TAFT UPHOLDS BALLINGER

Takes Sides Against Pinchot and Orders the Discharge of L. H. Glavis.

Albany, N. Y.—President Taft has upheld the secretary of the interior in his controversy with Gifford Pinchot of the reclamation service, and in the upholding has criticised the methods of Mr. Pinchot to such an extent that it is expected that Mr. Pinchot will leave the government service.

In addition, the president orders the discharge of L. H. Glavis, chief of field division of the general land office. Mr. Glavis made the formal charges against Mr. Ballinger that Mr. Pinchot has talked of in his speeches on the Pacific coast. He is discharged for filing a statement unjustly impeaching the official integrity of his superior officers.

The president specifically exonerates Secretary Ballinger from the charge of having used his office for personal ends. The president says conservation must be carried on within the law, indicating clearly that in his opinion Mr. Pinchot has been going beyond the law.

NEW APPEAL BY PATRICK

Again Sets Up Claim That Governor Had No Right to Save His Life.

Albany, N. Y.—Albert T. Patrick, who is serving a life sentence in Sing Sing for the murder of William Marsh Rice in New York in 1900, has filed notice of an appeal from a decision rendered by the appellate division dismissing the writ of habeas corpus granted him by Justice William J. Gaynor last February.

Patrick again claims he is confined illegally and that Gov. Higgins had no right to commute his sentence from death to life imprisonment.

Fez.—El Roghi, the rebellious subject of the sultan of Morocco, who recently was brought here in an iron cage, was put to death in the presence of the imperial harem.

HITS AT COOK AGAIN

PEARY INSISTS HIS RIVAL HANDED THE WORLD A "GOLD BRICK."

STANDS PAT ON CHARGES

Gives New Facts About His Discovery of the Pole—Says He Will Leave the Controversy to a Competent Tribunal.

Battle Harbor, Labrador.—(Via Marconi wireless telegraphy to Cape Ray, N. F.)—Commander Robert E. Peary consented to talk further concerning his successful dash to the north pole. He dwelt particularly upon the observations taken at the apex of the world and the movements of Harry Whitney, the sportsman of New Haven, Conn., who has been described as the bearer of records substantiating Dr. Frederick A. Cook's claim to have reached the pole April 21, 1908.

"We took five observations prior to reaching the pole," Commander Peary said. "Two of them were made and worked out by the late Prof. Ross Marvin, who prepared duplicate records in each case, and duly signed the duplicate certificates. To guard against accident I took one set of these papers and Prof. Marvin took the other.

Took Observations at Pole.

"When a distance of 125 miles from the pole, the third observation was made by Capt. Bartlett, who also signed the records and certificates in duplicate, he retaining one set and I the other. The fourth and fifth observations were made by myself, the last being taken five miles from the pole proper."

"Was there more than one observation taken at the pole, and by whom?" the explorer was asked.

"There were several observations," he replied. "You must understand that the pole is a theoretical point, without length, breadth or thickness. Its actual location depends on the accuracy of the instruments employed and the conditions under which the observations are taken."

"You have stated, Commander Peary, that a copy of your records and polar observations was wrapped in a piece of a silk American flag and deposited in an ice cavity at the pole; did any person witness this act?"

To this question Commander Peary declined to make any answer at present.

Continuing, Peary said that Dr. Cook was expected by the world to submit to an impartial tribunal or board of arbitration a revised and authentic signed statement of his alleged discovery of the pole. Dr. Cook soon would reach the United States, Commander Peary said, and he was glad at the prospect of the matter being submitted for consideration at an early date.

Gave World "Gold Brick."

Continuing, the explorer said that he had stated in a private message to a friend that Dr. Cook had given the world a "gold brick." This message had been allowed to leak out, and while he would have preferred a more elegant expression, he was willing now to let these words stand because they were at least emphatic. The explorer said also that he would turn over to a competent tribunal and the public certified copies of his own observations made on his trip to the pole, with all other information bearing thereon. Peary does not care to exhibit these records at the present time for the reason that the information contained therein, if divulged in advance of the placing on file of Dr. Cook's authentic and definite statement, might be of advantage to the Cook partisans.

Cook Brings Proof.

On Board the Steamship Oscar II., at Sea—(Via Marconi wireless telegraph to Cape Race, N. F.).—Dr. Frederick A. Cook requested that the following message be sent to the American people as he neared New York Friday on the steamer Oscar II:

> "Tell the people of America to have the fullest confidence in my conquest of the pole. I have records of observations made by me which will prove my claim. I shall be glad to again set my foot on American soil."

Dr. Cook discussed freely the assertions of Commander Peary that he had never reached the north pole and spoke of the causes that brought dissensions between the explorers.

In conversation with the passengers Dr. Cook has thrown some light on his experiences during the long journey to the pole and return. He has explained to them how the clothing of the members of the party wore down to rags and the Eskimos were obliged to devote their time to the making of fresh garments. The explorer and his companions possessed no thread with which to sew skins together and therefore unraveled their stockings and used the wool for thread.

Gets Penal Servitude.

London.—James Egan, who, according to the evidence of the police, once served a long term of imprisonment in New York, was sentenced at the Old Bailey Friday to three years' penal servitude, after having been found guilty of a series of frauds upon women.

Powder Explosion Kills 200.

Paris.—A special dispatch from Tangier says 200 men were killed by the explosion of a powder magazine near Mogador.

HOW HE DID THE CHORES

Wound Up the Music Box and Put His Corkscrew In the Barometer.

"You needn't wait for me," explained the head of the house; "I have a dinner engagement, an important business affair, and no doubt I shall be kept quite late."

At breakfast next morning an ominous silence had fallen upon all. The head of the house had no appetite and was evidently far from feeling well. After a painful silence the husband, without meeting his wife's eye, essayed to start conversation.

It's funny about that clock," he said. "It's stopped, and I'm sure I wound it last night."

"You are mistaken," said his wife, icily; "you wound up Willie's music box instead and it played 'Home, Sweet Home' till daylight. The clock in the hall has also stopped, but I find that you screwed your corkscrew into the barometer."

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

ON BRESNAHAN'S STAFF OF PITCHERS

Pitcher Sallee is one of the numerous twirlers on the roster of the St. Louis National league club. He was recently suspended indefinitely by Manager Bresnahan for taking a ten-days' leave of absence without permission.

GIBSON SETS NEW RECORD

Pittsburg Backstop Exceeds Charley Zimmer's Old Mark for Consecutive Work.

Catcher "Hack" Gibson of the Pittsburg Pirates has exceeded the wonderful record made by Charley Zimmer, who caught 111 consecutive games during the season of 1890.

It is much harder now to make such a record than ever before, as the game has changed and the wear and tear on a catcher is harder, especially when one considers the fact that the team he has been catching for has been in the lead for so long.

It was on May 5 that Gibson took a rest, just for one day, when O'Connor relieved him. He then started in to work again, and every day since he has been seen behind the bat for the Pirates.

The nearest any catcher has ever come to these two records is that of Flint, who caught 120 out of 121 games while a member of the Chicago team in 1877. McGuire, now managing Cleveland, caught 132 games during the season of 1896, while Kling of the champion Cubs caught the same number as Flint in 1903. This leaves Gibson with the record in major leagues with 140 games which he caught last season.

The greatest number of games ever caught during one season was made by Berry, who caught 175 games while a member of the San Francisco team of the Pacific Coast league.

PITCHES FOR MILWAUKEE

Frank Schneiberg, one of the slab artists of Manager McCloskey of the Milwaukee American association team.

Luck of the Tigers.

Baseball scouts assert that Detroit had a lot of luck in securing Pitcher Browning from the San Francisco club, over the draft route. Besides Detroit, the Chicago Cubs, Cincinnati, St. Louis Nationals and Pittsburg put in drafts for him. The club owners drew for the player and Frank Navin of the Tigers was fortunate enough to win him. He has won 15 games out of 17 pitched.

PHILADELPHIA OUTFIELDER

The above is a photograph of John W. Bates, the clever outfielder recently traded by the Boston National league club to the Philadelphia team. Bates was born in Steubenville, O., 27 years ago. He learned to play the game in that town and made his professional debut in 1905 with the home club, then a member of the Ohio-Pennsylvania league. In his first year he made a reputation as a hard long-distance hitter, and in the fall the Boston Nationals drafted him at the suggestion of Tom Needham, the Chicago catcher, who was then with Boston. In the spring of 1906 he went South with the Bostons and earned a place on the team which he has held ever since. Bates has been playing the best game in his career this year and his sale to Philadelphia was a great surprise.

Johnson's Injuries Serious.

Walter Johnson, Washington's premier pitcher, and one of the star twirlers of the American league, may never pitch another major league game. Because of an injury to his shoulder, Johnson was forced to leave the team in Chicago and return to Washington for rest and treatment. The pitcher hurt his arm during a recent game at Cleveland. He said then that his condition was such that he could not play another game this season. It is feared that one of the ligaments of Johnson's arm is torn, and in that event there is only slight chance for the complete restoration of the arm. Johnson has pitched 40 games this year and has shown splendid form.

Demontereville Quits Game.

The other day marked the retirement from baseball for good of Eugene Demontreville, infielder of the Chicago National league team in the nineties, and for three years a member of the Toledo club. Demontreville played his last game with the New Orleans team of the Southern league, from which organization he has just purchased his release to go into business. Demont, as he came to be known in baseball, has accepted the secretaryship of a fair association in Birmingham, Ala., in which city he played ball after leaving Toledo, and where he was popular. Demont fielded well in his last season on the diamond, but his batting was only fair.

Houston Heads Texas League.

The Texas league finished its championship season with Houston in possession of its first pennant. More than a dozen players were drafted or purchased by the major leagues and several will report at once.

ROBBINSDALE BANK ENTERED

SEVENTH IN RAPID SERIES OF CRIMINAL ATTEMPTS PROVES UNSUCCESSFUL.

ALL IN VICINITY OF TWIN CITIES

Robbers Flee in Midst of Work on Steel Safe.—Drops of Nitroglycerine on Floor; Two-Foot Brick Wall Pierced.

VIOLENCE OF TWO MONTHS

July 14.—E. M. Trenkley's store in St. Louis Park, Excelsior, robbed.

July 15.—Safe blown in Joslin Brothers' store in Excelsior and $500 stolen.

Aug. 5.—Robber held up cashier of White Bear bank; afterward shot dead; two citizens killed by him, and several wounded.

Aug. 18.—Three robbers attempt holdup of Paul Podany's saloon, Minneapolis.

Aug. 19.—Cracksmen attempted to blow safe in Twin City bank at Midway, but were foiled.

Aug. 22.—Highwayman held up watchman at Wildwood and blew safe in Barnett's pavilion, getting small booty.

Aug. 25.—Attempt to blow safe in Mendota postoffice.

Aug. 26.—Robbers held up cashier of Wayzata State bank, got $325, and were captured.

Aug. 27.—Street lunch wagon robbed of $40 in St. Paul.

Aug. 28.—Robbers held up Charles Anderson's saloon, in Minneapolis, and murdered Oscar Larson.

Sept. 1.—Highwaymen held up a streetcar in St. Paul.

Sept. 13.—Attempt to blow safe in Robbinsdale bank and robbery of money in cash drawers.

Minneapolis, Minn.—The seventh in a two months' series of attempted or successful bank robberis and safe blowings occurring in the twin cities and outlying towns occurred when robbers entered the State Bank of Robbinsdale, by cutting through the solid wall of the vault and fleeing only before exploding a charge of nitroglycerine which was prepared for the safe.

Every one of these depredations has occurred since July 14. They include, besides minor robberies, the White Bear bank outrage, the attempt to blow up the safe in the Twin City bank at Midway, the attempt to blow the Mendota postoffice safe, the holdup of the cashier of the Wayzata State bank and the Cedar avenue saloon holdup and fatal duel.

Get Only $30.

The Robbinsdale robbers got only $30. This was in the vault, but outside the safe. They escaped hours before the crime was known, and left only their evidences behind.

The careful preparation is taken to indicate that the men were experienced. They broke first into the Great Northern section house, took out the hand-car and placed it on a sidetrack ready for hasty flight.

Next they forced a door in the bank and set to work on the brick wall of the vault. This was two feet thick, but a hole was cut sufficiently large to admit the passage of a man and the crevices around the safe door was soaped to hold the nitroglycerine. Several drops of the explosive were found on the floor, indicating that the men even had the stuff ready to pour into the joints when some noise apparently frightened them.

The bottle which contained the nitroglycerine was not to be found.

TORNADO AT COLERAINE.

Buildings Are Badly Damaged and Loss is Estimated at $50,000.

Duluth.—A tornado struck Coleraine, western Mesaba, and continued an hour, completely demolishing the $20,000 two-story brick block belonging to A. M. Murnike, of Eveleth.

The wind also destroyed the grandstand and scattered the fence of the Coleraine baseball team, involving a loss of $1,000, partly razed the scaffold of the Itasca Ski Club's slide, which was to have been used in the national tournament to be held here next winter, lifted up the big Palace livery barn and set it diagonally on the lots, split telephone poles, damaged the mines, several stores, residences and outbuildings and did thousands of dollars worth of damage to fences, sidewalks, streets and avenues.

HUMAN BONES ARE UNEARTHED.

Skeleton Is Found While Leveling Road Near Bluff Siding.

Winona.—In leveling a road adjoining the farm of George Mertes, about a mile north of Bluff Siding across the river from here, a full-sized skeleton was unearthed and the skull of another to which the bones of the trunk were missing. The bones bear evidence of having lain beneath the ground for a long time, and it is believed they are those of Indians.

RECORD FAIR ATTENDANCE.

48,015 People Were Present on the Closing Day.

Hamline, Sept. 15.—Automobile day saved the state fair records, and the entire credit is due to the loyal manner in which the automobilists co-operated with the management to make the day a success. Minneapolis and St. Paul fell down in holding up their records, and on Friday night the attendance figures were 12,000 behind the mark set by the first five days of the 1908 fair.

It was up to the automobilists to make up these figures and save the record. Althought the attendance on Saturday was large, none of the fair officials came within 5,000 admissions of reaching the total for the day. As late as midnight Saturday the superintendent of gates gave the estimate for the day as only 43,000, basing the figures on the turnstile count at 6 p. m. This left the week's attendance nearly 4,000 below the record for 1908.

Superintendent Is Surprised.

When Leslie G. Fuller, auditor for the superintendent of gates had checked up all the automobilists who had gone through the horse gates in their cars the attendance for the day was swelled to 48,015.

This made the total attendance for the week 328,678, compared with 326,743, the total for the previous fair—an increase of about 2,000. As the fair management had cut down the free list from 75,684 to about 55,000, the record is entirely satisfactory to the mangers, as the number of paid admissions increased about 23,000.

The grandstand admissions rose from 152,245 in 1908 to 154,356 for this lear, thereby materially increasing the receipts of the fair. The grandstand last week paid a net dividend of more than 10 per cent on its cost.

Surplus Gets $25,000.

It will not be possible to obtain a complete financial report for several days, but the profits are approximately estimated at $100,000. The surplus will not be as large as usual on account of the great expense in completing the grandstand, constructing the farm implements buildings, and the cost of the work on the lagoons and various other improvements. The managers expect to carry about $25,000 over for next year's fair.

Hamline, Minnesota.—On the closing day of the State Fair, Ralph de Palma broke the mile, three mile and ten-mile world's automobile records, for circular tracks. His time for the three distances was, 50 4-5 seconds, 2.37½ and 8.59 3-5. His car is a Fiat.

THREE DIE IN WHITE BEAR FIRE.

Three Children Perish Out of a Family of Thirteen.

St. Paul, Minn.—Fire destroyed the summer cottage of Robert A. Walsh, of St. Paul, at White Bear lake, and three children of a family of 13, Constance, aged 9 months; Robert, aged 4 years, and John, aged 5 years, were burned to death.

William, another son, 9 years old, was terribly burned about the head, arms and chest in his heroic efforts to save his little brothers and sisters, six of whom were sleeping in the second story of the cottage.

Sarah, another daughter, was badly burned about the arms in her efforts to help the imprisoned babies on the second floor. Mr. Walsh, the father, was also badly burned. He received his injuries from the explosion of a gasoline stove in the kitchen, which exploded when he attempted to fill the reservoir, supposing that none of the burners were lighted. One, however, had been left burning and when he poured the gasoline into the tank the gas caught fire.

The fire immediately spread thruout the frame structure and it was a roaring furnace in a few minutes.

Six children, including those dead, were sleeping on the second floor and were practically imprisoned by the flames. The rest of the family of 13 children and the parents were downstairs.

William, who is now in St. Joseph's hospital, St. Paul, might have escaped without injury had he not remained to assist his less fortunate brothers and sisters. He was finally compelled to jump from a second-story window.

KETHMAN HEARING ADJOURNED.

Continued Until Sept. 17, Owing to Absence of Witness.

Moorhead.—The preliminary hearing of Frank Kethman, charged with the murder of Dr. T. S. Egge, was not concluded, and on account of the inability of Miss Lillian Wright, one of the most important witnesses, to be present, the case was again adjourned to Friday, Sept. 17. Miss Wright is said to be out of the state. Attorney McEnroe gave notice to the court commissioner that he wished to make further cross-examination of the state witnesses, Hollie Walters, the keeper of the saloon where trouble between Dr. Egge and Frank Kethman is alleged to have begun, and Frank Knertson, who was in the saloon at the time.

REMOVAL STIRS ST. CLOUD.

Mayor Evans Ousts Sergeant Who Opposed Chief.

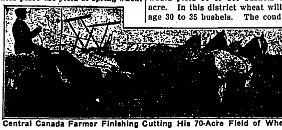
St. Cloud.—Sergeant Edward Brick of the St. Cloud police department was removed by Mayor Evans, and Frank Bettenberg, former sergeant of police, was named for the vacancy.

Police Sergeant Brick was removed from office as a direct result of a charge made by him against the chief of police, alleging attempts to shield guilty parties in the Lizzie Swintek affair.

WESTERN CANADA

During the early days in the period of the growth of the grain crop in Western Canada, as well as throughout the ripening and garnering period, there is yearly growing an increasing interest throughout the United States, as to the results when harvest is completed. These mean much to the thousands of Americans who have made their homes in some of the three Provinces that form that vast agricultural domain, and are of considerable interest to the friends they have left behind.

The year 1909 is no disappointment. The crops of wheat, oats and barley have been harvested and it is now safe to speak of results. Careful estimates place the yield of spring wheat at 30 bushels per acre, winter wheat at over 40 bushels, and oats exceed 50 bushels per acre. Barley also has proved an abundant yield. What will attract the reading public more than volumes of figures will be the fact that those who have been induced through the influence of the Government to accept of 160 acres of free grant land; or, by the persuasion of friends to leave their home State of Dakota, Minnesota, Iowa, Illinois, Michigan, Indiana, Ohio, Nebraska or the other States from which people have gone, have done well. Financially, they are in a better position than many of them ever expected to be, and in the matter of health, in social conditions, they have lost nothing.



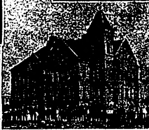
A Central Canada Farmer Finishing Cutting His 70-Acre Field of Wheat

One person who has just returned from a trip through the Lethbridge District, where winter wheat has a strong hold with farmers, says:

"We saw some magnificent sights. The crops were, in fact, all that could be desired."

In a few years from now these great plains over whose breadth for years roved hundreds of thousands of herds of cattle, following the millions of buffalo that once grazed their grasses, will be a solid grain field covering a territory of over 30,000 square miles, and very little of it but what will yet be worth from $40 to $60 per acre. Already the homestead and pre-emption lands are being well filled.

County School House



Town School House

City Church in Central Canada

In the district of Calgary, south, east and north, which comprises Nanton, High River and other equally important districts, a correspondent of the Winnipeg (Manitoba) Free Press says: (Aug. 21) "The grain in this district is going to make some money for the farmers this year. All the crop is now crowding along and is good on both irrigated and unirrigated lands."

There are to be found those who speak of a "pioneering" life in western Canada, but as one man said, "if this is pioneering I don't for the life of me see what our forefathers had to complain of." He didn't know, though, for the pioneering of his forefathers was discomfort and hardship. The opening up and development of western Canada, with its railroad lines to carry one to almost the uttermost part of it, the telegraph line to flash the news to the outside world, the telephone to talk to one's neighbor, the daily and weekly mail service which brings and carries letters to the friends in distant parts; the schools headed by college-bred and highly certificated teachers; the churches manned by brilliant divines; the clubs; the social and festive life; what is there about any of this to give to the man who goes there to make his home the credit of being a pioneer? Nothing! He might as well be in any of the old middle-west States. In other parts of the world the production of wheat is diminishing today; but as it diminishes Canada's will increase; therefore, it is safe to predict that in a few years from now a large part of the world will be looking to western Canada for its wheat supply, and especially will the United States. In many parts of western Canada it is possible to have a hundred-mile square of wheat, without a break. A writer says: "We were driven west and north of Moose Jaw through 20 miles of dead ripe wheat, acres of stocks and well-worked summer-fallows. One of these fields would yield 40 bushels to the acre, and another man had oats that would yield 90 or 100 bushels to the acre. In this district wheat will average 30 to 35 bushels. The conditions were never better and throughout the district the people are assured of a most prosperous year."

It would be unfair to close this article without quoting from an expert crop-correspondent regarding the two Battlefords in Central Saskatchewan, on the line of the Canadian Northern Railway. Writing on August 18th of this year, he says:

"It is necessary to drive about six or seven miles out of the town of North Battleford in order to see the best crops of the district. This morning I was driven about 20 miles to the north and west of the town and in all the drive did not see a poor crop. I saw one wheat crop which the owner estimates will yield 40 bushels per acre, and I believe it."

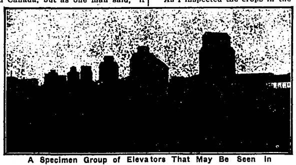
He then crossed the Saskatchewan river to the South town, or Battleford proper, and continues his report:

"Conditions around the old town are as good if not better than those to the north of the river. This district has much the best wheat crop prospect of any I have inspected this year, considering sample and yield. The weather conditions for the whole season have been ideal and the result is what might easily be termed a bumper crop. A sample sheaf brought in from the farm of George Truscott was shown to me which spoke for itself. This farmer is said to have sixty acres which will yield 45 bushels per acre.

In stating an average for the district of South Battleford I would say that the wheat will yield 36 bushels per acre. The oats will yield about 45 and barley 35 bushels per acre."

A correspondent summing up a trip over the Canadian Northern Railway, from Dauphin to Battleford, says:

"As I inspected the crops in the various districts I found the farmers and other citizens without exception filled with expectant enthusiasm over this year's prospects. No district was found which could not boast of fields of 35 bushels per acre wheat, or 50 to 60 bushels per acre oats, and of 40 bushels per acre of barley.'



A Specimen Group of Elevators That May Be Seen in Many Towns in Central Canada

It is not an unusual thing in many parts of western Canada for a farmer to have 10,000 to 30,000 bushels of wheat. In the Rouleau district it is said that there are several farmers who will have 20,000 bushels of oats any many fields will return one hundred bushels to the acre.

It takes an army of men to handle the Western Canada crop, and it is estimated that 30,000 people have been brought in this year to assist in the great undertaking; there being excursions from the outside world nearly every dey for the past six weeks.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Red Lake County Minnesota.

Subscription price $1.00 per year in advance. If not paid in advance $1.50

Entered as Second-class matter August 20 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam, Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3 1879.

Judging from the number of notices being published for a county ditch, our neighbors on the north side of the river are going to drain their land.

We note that our Co. Com. up this way does not vote on some of the questions brought up before that "shade of three." You may as well vote Joe and let the horns go with the hide, but just drop them a hint that the majority in this county will not always vote in the manority.

The older parts of the county are reporting extra large yields of wheat and oats, but this the newer part have not threshed yet, but when they do, just look out for the laurels of the southern part of the county for we believe we have them did, for heavy crops.

Our County Commissioner may think they done something smart when they voted that bridge money away from Thief River Falls, but they didn't. But we are of the opinion that instead of handing out a lemon, as they intended to do, that they did hand out one of the smoothes pieces of county division timber that we ever set eyes on.

We want it distinctly understood, that whatever opinion we choose to express regarding the present situation in this county, comes from Sunbeam, and not Thief River, or Red Lake Falls. They are two parties that are fighting over the county seat, and we are representing a large number of farmers and taxpyers, and propose to give them the facts of the case, without calling an old black kettle white.

We used to know an old fellow over in Polk county who delighted to be in a coutinual lawsuit, and was always on record every term of court as the plaintiff, or defendant in from one to three red hot lawsuits. But the people got "next" to the old fellow at last, and when he appered before the grand jury to start another lawsuit, after his five or six years at it, that body dismissed him with a severe reprimand, and told him to go home and cultivate a more friendly feeling with his neighbors and stop putting useless expenses on the county by his continuous law suits. It would be well for some men in this county to take this advice, and stop their lawsuits, before they bakrupt the county.

In the last proceedings of our board of County Commissioners we note the following bills allowed. F.A.Grady, to Prof.sevices and expenses in case of P.B. Gaass vs. Board of Co. Com'r's, ... $205.50.

F.A.Grady, to Prof. sevices. and expenses in case of Martain V. Evenson vs— Co. Com'r's et al, ... $155.50.

It seems that Pro. Grady is an expensive Prof. according to the above bills, and these are only a small portion of the expenses of county lawsuits that are taxed up to the taxpayers of this county to pay for this string of law suits that have been kept going for the past four years, and we challange anyone to note one single change, where anyone is ahead or behind, except the tax payers who are way behind and the lawyers are way ahead.

The Only Ad. He Got.

There was a man in our town,
And he was wonderous wise.
He swore by all the gods that be,
He ne'er would advertise,

At last one day he advetised,
And thereby hangs a tale,
The ad. was set in nonparell,
And headed "Sheriff's Sale."

Picturesque Japanese Peasants.

The most characteristic scenery in Japan is not the mountain, on which few Japanese dwell, but the rice field, which is to be found wherever there is a patch of level ground for the field and sufficient water for irrigation. Gentle slopes are made useful by terracing, and the cooly, preparing the ground or cutting his crop, is the true Japanese peasant. He is a picturesque peasant in his blue cotton suit, his broad, conical straw hat and straw overcoat. He is a good natured peasant, absurdly contented with his earnings, though the agricultural laborer earns as little as 8 or 10 cents gold a day. His house is a light wooden frame surmounted by a heavy thatch, and he loves to plant a lily garden along his rooftree. But he always has one thing which separates him from the Chinese and the East Indian—he lives on a platform raised above the ground. No hardened soil for him, no chilly pavement or brick or stone. A wooden floor, a piece of clean matting, a broom and a bathtub the poorest Japanese will always have.—Tokyo Letter to Boston Transcript.

A Deceptive Air.

The Bushby storekeeper surveyed Mr. Leonard with a contemplative eye and then turned his gaze toward Jimmy Sleane, who was putting packages into the delivery wagon. Jimmy had the leisurely air of one with plenty of time at his disposal.

"You want to know how he'd be for your business down below?" said Mr Gregg slowly.

"Yes," said the visitor. "I noticed him yesterday, when that crowd of young fellows were getting the piano into the hall; he seemed to work harder than any of the others. It occurred to me he might like a bigger chance than he has here."

"M-m," said the storekeeper. "Well, now, I can't say as to that, of course, but as to his working harder than any of the other boys, I'll tell you what they say, and you can believe it or not, jest as you choose.

"They all like Jimmy, for he's first rate company, but the truth is that when it comes to lifting, or such work, Jimmy's all take holt and mighty little h'ist."—Youth's Companion.

Dark Walls Best For Illumination.

Some scientists who have been making investigations into the part played in the matter of illumination by light and dark walls have come to the conclusion that the dark walls are better fitted for good illumination than the light. In a room where the walls are dark and where the source of light is entirely behind the reader's field of vision a person who reads is impressed with the idea that the room is excellently well illuminated, but if now another light is brought into the room and placed within the field of his vision, though not shining on the paper he is reading, the pupils of his eyes will contract, less light will enter them from the paper he reads, and the reader will be impressed with the idea that the illumination has been reduced and the paper is becoming darker. These scientists say that the experiments show that if the walls are light colored the efficiency of the illumination may actually be diminished.—Pathfinder.

Honest Answer.

The stories told of Snetzler, a famous Swiss organ builder, prove that he was a man of rare and incorruptible honesty. At one time the parish officers of a country church applied to Snetzler to examine their organ and make improvements in it.

"Gentlemen," said Snetzler after a careful examination of the instrument in question, "your organ be. wort £100 joost now. Vell, I vill spend you £100 on it, and it shall den be wort £50!"—London Graphic.

Those Elaborate Defenses.

"Would you shoot a man who assailed your veracity?"

"No," answered the peaceful citizen "I'd rather take a chance on his personal opinion than to go before a jury with a story that might convince the general public that he was right."—Washington Star.

Pretty Light.

"I'll have to ask you to pay in advance," remarked the hotel keeper.

"Isn't my luggage good enough security?"

"I fear it is a little too emotional."

"Emotional?"

"Yes; easily moved."—London Mail.

S. A. SWANSON

[Court Seal] Judge of Probate.

Then and Now.

Act I.

Tilkins—How is business, Wilkins?

Wilkins—Can't make it go. At this rate I shall be bankrupt in another month. I don't seem to have any head for business.

Tilkins—No; you haven't. But you have a good start, and if you'll promise to let me run things I'll go in with you as partner.

Wilkins—Done. A friend in need is a friend indeed.

Act II.—Ten Years Later.

Guest—What a magnificent place you have—everything that wealth could buy or heart long for! You have been wonderfully prosperous, Mr. Wilkins.

Mr. Wilkins (sadly)—True, but, after all, I get only half the profits of my great establishment. I tell you, my friend, the mistake of my life was taking a partner.—London Scraps.

Fear of Premature Burial.

The fear of premature burial, which prompted the late Lord Burton to direct by his will that his heart should be removed from his body, has caused many well known men and women to order a surgical operation to be performed upon their bodies. Harriet Martineau left her doctor £10 to amputate her head, and Lady Burton directed that her heart should be pierced with a needle. The late Edmund Yates left instructions that his jugular vein should be severed, with a provision that a fee of 20 guineas should be paid for the purpose. Literary persons appear to have been particularly afraid of premature burial. Bishop Berkeley, Lord Lytton, Hans Andersen and Wilkie Collins all took measures to protect themselves from it.—Westminster Gazette.

The Smuggled Box.

A joker had some fun with the customs officials at New York some years ago. A servant had gone ashore from a German liner with a basket and was about to leave the pier when a passenger whispered to a customs officer that he had better see what the basket contained. Following the tip, the basket bearer was detained, and a wooden box was found among a lot of soiled linen. The box contained another and this still another box, the third securely fastened with screws. When these were removed a card was discovered on which was written in three languages, "This is the 1st of April Many happy returns of the day."

Barrie and Kipling.

Mr. Barrie was one day at Waterloo station in a hurry to catch a train. He was hastening from the bookstall laden with papers, "a good many sixpenny ones among them," he dolefully relates, when, in rushing around a corner, he fell into the arms of Rudyard Kipling, equally in a tearing hurry. They turned on each other with scowling faces, then smiled in recognition and asked each other whither he went. Then Kipling, exclaiming, "Lucky beggar, you've got papers!" seized the bundle from Barrie, flung him some money and made off. "But you did not stoop to pick up his dirty halfpence, did you?" queried one of Mr. Barrie's hearers amusedly. "Didn't I, though?" returned Barrie, and added ruefully, "But he hadn't flung me half enough."—St. James' Gazette.

A Singular Meal.

One of the most singular meals ever eaten was that given to a select few by an antiquary named Goebel in Brussels some years ago. The bread was made from wheat grown before the children of Israel passed out of Egypt, and it was spread with butter made when Elizabeth ruled England. For fruit there were apples which ripened before the Christian era, and the wine was older than the white man's knowledge of the new world. The bread was made from wheat taken from a chamber in one of the pyramids, the butter (of which there were several pounds) had been found in an earthen crock on a stone shelf under the icy waters of a well in Scotland. A pantry in the ruins of Pompeii had furnished the jar of apples (which were as sweet and finely flavored as if only a few months old), and the flagon of wine had been recovered from an old vault in Corinth. Six guests enjoyed this amazing meal.—Chicago News.

British Savings Clubs.

The working people of England are great patrons of savings clubs, all sorts of agencies being created to enable them to save money that they may have it to spend during the festive season of the year. There are clubs of all kinds, ranging from the shop club, to which the workingmen contribute, to the little clubs run for the purpose of letting school children have a shilling's worth of sweets for a Christmas treat. There is hardly a workshop of any importance in London without its workmen's saving club, besides which there are many dividing clubs carried on at public houses, and the deposits amount in the aggregate to a very large sum. The withdrawals begin in the early days of December, and it is not uncommon for the banks to pay out £300 ($1,460) to £500 ($2,433) to a single club, and the problem of storing the money is one of some difficulty. As the amounts have to be divided among many people they are wanted in cash, and in some cases the proportion of gold, silver and copper is specified.

Easter Island.

Easter Island is a lonely Pacific islet, forty-seven square miles in area, entirely volcanic and containing several extinct craters, some of which are more than a hundred feet high; discovered by Roggeveen on Easter Sunday, 1722. Little is known concerning the curious remains which have made the island famous. They consist of more than 500 rudely carved stone statues and busts, varying in height from three to seventy feet and said to be portraits of famous men, not idols. There are also hundreds of stone houses on the island, with painted interiors and incised tablets which, strange to say, have never been deciphered. Between 1860 and 1862 the population, by reason of polyandry and emigration, dwindled to 130 souls, and in 1863 most of these were carried off by the Peruvians to work guano. The few inhabitants left are fair haired Polynesians. Since 1838 the island has been a Chilean convict station.—New York Telegram.

Sven Hedin's Experience.

Dr. Sven Hedin, the famous traveler and explorer, had some terrible experiences during a journey through Tibet. He told how, owing to the high altitude at which he and his party traveled, that to unbutton one's coat meant acute pain and tension to an overwrought heart, which literally was at the point of breaking. His only safety lay in the fact that he never left the saddle for a single moment from morning till evening. Had he done so his heart would have given way. At one time they were nine days without water, and when at last he saw a small pool Dr. Hedin drank five pints without stopping.

A Spa's Curious Origin.

The discovery of the famous Woodhall spa in Lincolnshire was very curious. Just about a hundred years ago a shaft was sunk in search of coal, but the effort had to be abandoned owing to a rush of water. In time the water found its way into a small brook, and in due course the inhabitants began to speak of the curative powers of the stream. Science investigated the mystery and discovered that the water in the coalless shaft was richly impregnated with various salts and bromine and iodine. Geologists expressed the interesting opinion that ages ago the place was the sandy bed of a shallow lagoon or bay of a tropical sea where seaweeds of giant growth abounded. A mighty convulsion of nature lowered the sea bed, a great river flowed over the place, and in time its debris was formed into a mass of spongy rock or sandstone. Forcing itself through this mass at great pressure some 600 feet below the ground, the water now extracts the constituents of the original seaweed.—London Family Herald.

TENDERWING IN THE UPPER AIR

BY WINTHROP E. SCARRITT

FINISHING THE PROCESS OF INFLATION

AT LAST the day of dreams had come. For had it not been a boyhood dream to step into the car of a balloon and go sailing away into the undimmed blue of the inviting sky. And now I was to cross the line which separates the kingdom of anticipation from that of realization.

I must confess that my devotions that morning were a little more protracted and fervent than usual. However, the time and the place and the man—the pilot—were most opportune, for I was to be the guest of England's foremost balloonist, that prince of splendid sportsmen, Hon. Charles S. Rolls. We were to sail over London, "the playground of history," as my talented friend, C. N. Williamson, happily phrased it.

Taking a taxicab at the Savoy hotel in company with some Canadian friends, we bowled along the bank of the Thames to Short's balloon works, Queens Circus, Battersea Park. It was a clear, crisp afternoon, and the touch of winter was in the air. We turned a sharp corner, and in the distance I caught my first glimpse of our aerial—might it not prove a heavenly?—chariot. It was swaying in the afternoon sun, a great golden ball 42 feet in diameter, and extending up above the housetops. Its name was the Venus. Mr. Rolls, the owner and pilot, gave us a cordial welcome. The other passengers, the Hon Mrs. Assheton Harbord and Mr. Jack Humphreys, had already arrived. Meanwhile a strong breeze had sprung up, and as I gazed at the Venus swaying to and fro in the wind and straining at the squeaking ropes, I was reminded of a nervous, blooded racehorse champing at his bits, anxious to be off. Suddenly the question came to my mind, "Where will this impatient, yellow, pot-bellied beast take us and what will it do with us when it gets us there?"

The balloon basket was about 4½ feet square and about that depth and was held to the ground by many bags of sand, each having a rope handle and weighing about 42 pounds.

It is surprising to the layman to see the number of things taken on such a journey. There were a drag-rope, an anchor-rope and anchor, a huge and well-filled lunch basket, a statoscope—an instrument which indicates whether you are ascending or descending—an anemometer, a thermometer and a barograph, a little clock-like apparatus which shows by a continuous line on a chart just how many feet one is above the earth. Also we had extra wraps, a good map of England and seven bags of sand hung on the outside as ballast.

My first surprise on stepping into the basket and looking up at the great, distended bag above was to discover that the mouth, or appendix-like opening at the bottom of the balloon, was open and that I could see straight through to the top, where was located the escape-valve. I immediately inquired if it "ought to be like that?" I was told yes, that opening was essential in order to allow the expanding gas to escape; otherwise the balloon would burst. I then inquired whether that opening was large enough to let the gas out fast enough. Mr. Rolls thought it was. But, I persisted, suppose it isn't—what will become of us? "That will depend upon your past life," was the laconic reply. Up to this moment I had felt no alarm or undue anxiety. One by one the helpers unhooked the bags of sand that had been holding us to earth. At length the basket swung clear of the ground and was only kept from ascending by a half-dozen pairs of strong hands holding it within a foot or two of the earth.

Near us was a huge gas-tank about 70 feet tall. To me it looked 700. The direction of the wind would take us directly toward it. The balloon was edged away by the helpers to the farther side of the inclosure, as far as possible from that huge round iron tank. Would we hit it? Could we by some miracle miss it? There and then I got my first fright. It was a good, big, paralyzing fright. Oh, how hard, cruel and altogether repulsive that iron tank looked! There was nothing nice about it. I sat down on a large lunch basket in the southeast corner of the car and held on for dear life. Some way I didn't feel any inclination to stand up and look about and crack jokes—which jokes seemed to me quite ill-timed—as the others were doing. Suddenly I was startled by the cry, "Let go!" I am sure Gabriel's trumpet will not frighten me so much as did that cry, "Let go!" I am still of the opinion that Mr. Rolls need not have said it so loudly. Immediately we were shot into the air as though we were an arrow hurled from a mighty bow. I literally held my breath till we cleared that ugly gas reservoir, then I looked down and saw the pale, upturned faces of my friends gazing in speechless silence. I thought, "That is the way people look at a funeral," and I was not comforted.

In less time than I am taking to tell it we were 1,000 feet above the earth. How extremely careless of these people to keep standing up and even to lean over and look down when the side of the basket is only waist-high! I suggested that the next time I should insist on a basket that would come up to one's ears. Then occurred to me the story of the hungry boy who asked for the core of the apple his friend was eating with so much gusto, and received the slightly discouraging reply, "There ain't goin' to be no core." So perhaps with me there wasn't going to be any "next time."

Our altitude was now 2,000 feet and we were drifting in a light breeze straight across the city in the direction of St. Paul's cathedral, which we could easily distinguish on account of its dome of gold, which looked about the size of a large football. Just here it may be well to state that any one who thinks the pilot of a balloon has nothing to do is quite mistaken. Mr. Rolls, ably assisted by Mrs. Harbord—herself a cool and experienced balloonist who owns three fine balloons—made everything snug and taut. The various articles on board were conveniently arranged. The statoscope was keenly watched, and if we began to descend too rapidly a small scoopful of sand was gently sprinkled out. A good, clear map was at hand and as we progressed a red line was drawn indicating constantly our position. My anxiety was not lessened by a troubled look on our pilot's face.

As I write these lines my open diary lies before me and I will quote therefrom:

"We left the good old earth at 2:08 p. m. It is now 2:30. My fear is gone. As I pencil these words in peace and calm we are floating eastward 2,000 feet over London. I reflect that we are crossing the Playground of History. That tiny winding stream far below is the Thames. There is the House of Parliament and that little toy church near by is Westminster abbey of blessed memories, the last resting-place of kings and queens and scholars, earth's mighty Anglo-Saxon dead for generations. Now London bridge comes into view and London tower, of evil memories. That little green-roofed building is Greenwich observatory. That golden ball is the dome of St. Paul's and beneath us is the swarming traffic of the Strand. We look far beyond the hazy rim of London and in imagination see the green meadows or Runnymede and hear the clash of arms at Marston Moor. Across the gulf of the years we can see Caesar and his conquering legions and the white cliffs of Albion. Indeed we are over the Playground of History. 2:40. Our direction is changing for the better and we are drifting north of east and hence will have a longer ride. We have dropped a thousand feet and the noises of the city grow clamorous. Mr. Rolls is throwing out sand and closely watching his statoscope.

"The sun is behind a cloud and our barograph shows a straight line, indicating that we are sailing on an even keel, as it were—neither ascending nor descending. This is the great desire of sky pilots. 3:10. We are outside of London. Mr. Rolls announces gleefully that we have passed the Rubicon of our difficulties. He is kind in saying that he is glad I am making my first trip with him.

"Mrs. Harbrod opens a wonderful lunch-basket, and how delicious are those dainties and our hot tea up here among the clouds which are drifting lazily by like great white ships in a shoreless sea. 3:45. We have suddenly struck an upper current and have soared aloft. We are 2,600 feet above the earth. Yes, it is cold, and we button tight our overcoats. We are over Weald hall, a delightfully beautiful country estate. From the castle floats the union jack and also the stars and stripes. God grant they may ever float together in every land where civilization has a home or freedom a banner!

"Just now I looked up, and, oh, horrors! the balloon is on fire! No, I am mistaken, it is only the gas which is pouring out of the mouth of the bag. To my untrained eye it looks like smoke and I have been taught that where there is smoke there is likely to be fire. We have lost quite a lot of gas and the balloon has wrinkles and folds which do not look nice. I anxiously inquire if it ought to do like that. It looks like an enormous, leather-faced, toothless old giant getting ready to devour its victims four. I admire Mr. Humphreys' coolness through it all. Although a 'tenderwing' like my self, he is behaving better than I.

"Nothing has happened, and I am reassured again. Now we are floating on in the abyss of silence and of space. Above us, the deep blue sky; beneath us, the green fields and changing forests of Merry England.

"Did you every try to picture a sensation, or paint an emotion? I wish I might. Did you ever ponder over the soul of things? Did you ever dream that you were dead and as your spirit ascended from your body have you not looked down upon the worn-out casket and marveled at its strange stillness and quiet helplessness? This is my weird sensation as I now look down upon the earth, the grave of all things. Oh, the infinite calm and peace! We are light as air. We are free as birds. We are no longer mortals. We have been unleashed from earth and are on our happy way out into God's infinite, the near clouds our companions and the earth and all its carking cares fading away 'like the baseless fabric of a vision.'"

AFTER SUFFERING TEN YEARS

Cured by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

MARLTON, N.J.—I feel that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has given me new life. I suffered for ten years with serious female troubles, inflammation, ulceration, indigestion, nervousness, and could not sleep. Doctors gave me up, as they said my troubles were chronic. I was in despair, and did not care whether I lived or died, when I read about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound; so I began to take it, and am well again and relieved of all my suffering."—Mrs. GEORGE JORDY, Box 40, Marlton, N.J.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, made from native roots and herbs, contains no narcotics or harmful drugs, and to-day holds the record for the largest number of actual cures of female diseases we know of, and thousands of voluntary testimonials are on file in the Pinkham laboratory at Lynn, Mass., from women who have been cured from almost every form of female complaints, inflammation, ulceration, displacements, fibroid tumors, irregularities, periodic pains, backache, indigestion and nervous prostration. Every suffering woman owes it to herself to give Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a trial.

If you would like special advice about your case write a confidential letter to Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass. Her advice is free, and always helpful.

NEW STRENGTH FOR WOMEN'S BACKS.

How to Make a Bad Back Better.

Women who suffer with backache, bearing down pains, dizzy spells and that constant feeling of dullness and tiredness, will find hope in the advice of Mrs. Mary Hinson of 21 Strother St., Mt. Sterling, Ky. "Had I not used Doan's Kidney Pills, I believe I would not be living today," says Mrs. Hinson. "My eyesight was poor, I suffered with nervous, splitting headaches, spots would dance before my eyes and at times I would be so dizzy I would have to grasp something for support. My back was so weak and painful I could hardly bend over to button my shoes and could not get around without suffering severely. Doan's Kidney Pills helped me from the first, and I continued until practically well again."

A New One About Napoleon.

A "new" story about Napoleon is necessarily doubtful; the probability is that it is simply so old that it has been forgotten. However, here is one that Arthur M. Chuquet prints in L'Opinion as never before published. It relatesto Napoleon and Blucher.

The emperor received the general at the castle of Finkenstein, while he was preparing for the siege of Danzig. He drew him to a window in an upper story and paid him compliments on his military gifts, and Blucher, going away delighted, described the interview to his aide-de-camp. "What a chance you missed!" exclaimed the latter.

"You might have changed the whole course of history."

"How?"

"Why, you might have thrown him out of the window."

"Confound it!" replied Blucher. "So I might! If only I had thought of it."—New York Evening Post.

The Root of Altruism.

The three eternal roots of altruistic energy are these: First, the principle of justice; that there is a moral law before which all men are equal, so that I ought to help my neighbor to his rights. Second, the principle of charity;that I owe infinite tenderness to any shape or kind of man, however unworthy or useless to the state. Third, the principle of free will; that I can really decide to help my neighbor, and am truly disgraced if I do not do so. To this may be added the idea of a definite judgment; that is, that the action will at some time terribly matter to the helper and the helped.—G. K. Chesterton.

THE DOCTOR'S WIFE

Agrees with Him About Food.

A trained nurse says: "In the practice of my profession I have found so many points in favor of Grape-Nuts food that I unhesitatingly recommend it to all my patients.

"It is delicate and pleasing to the palate (an essential in food for the sick), and can be adapted to all ages, being softened with milk or cream for babies or the aged when deficiency of teeth renders mastication impossible. For fever patients or those on liquid diet I find 'Grape-Nuts and albumen water very nourishing and refreshing.'

"This recipe is my own idea and is made as follows: Soak a teaspoonful of Grape-Nuts in a glass of water for an hour, strain and serve with the beaten white of an egg and a spoonful of fruit juice for flavouring. This affords a great deal of nourishment that even the weakest stomach can assimilate without any distress.

"My husband is a physician and he uses Grape-Nuts himself and orders it many times for his patients.

"Personally I regard a dish of Grape-Nuts with fresh or stewed fruit as the ideal breakfast for anyone—well or sick."

In any case of stomach trouble, nervous prostration or brain fag, a 10 day trial of Grape-Nuts will work wonders toward nourishing and rebuilding and in this way ending the trouble.

"There's a Reason," and trial proves.

The Hoodoo

By E. S. Bladen

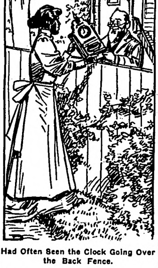
(Copyright, by J. B. Lippincott Co.)

In the year 1800 the United States sloop-of-war Ganges came into the port of Philadelphia with two slavers she had captured and 150 negro men and women, entirely naked, were accommodated in Independence hall, where an appeal was made to citizens to clothe them, to which there was a prompt response.

These negroes were chiefly Mandingos, tall, well-formed, and with beautiful bronze skins, prisoners-of-war to the neighboring tribes, who sold them. Among the lot there were a few Congos. They and their descendants never left Philadelphia, and between the latter and southern negroes there is an antipathy as strong as death.

Having been for the most part adopted by the members of the Society of Friends, they and their descendants became imbued with the domestic virtues and acquired quite elegant and aristocratic manners. Among them alone of all the colored population of the United States is to be found an occasional negro old maid. While they intermarried with one another, in the first generation there were seldom more than two or three children in a family, and in the third generation but one. Though not church people, as are the majority of the colored race, they have mild festivities in their own circle and a sort of community of feeling that induces them to take care of their old or sick, but the most remarkable characteristic is that some of them possess the art of hoodoo.

Where an isolated descendant of these 150 negroes of the year 1800 has not attained a competence, she usually attaches herself to a white family of good birth, and hoodoos not only her employers, but the whole neighborhood. Guests, business people, and strangers alike succumb to the military eye of the Hoodoo priestess.



Had Often Seen the Clock Going Over the Back Fence.

One of the most remarkable experiences of my life is how I came under this influence; but some 20 years since, finding it could be made beneficial by keeping the possessor of this gift always supplied with an abundance of fruit, especially bananas, I sank my personality and became an observer in this by-way of science.

Dr. Wilson of the Pennsylvania museum, says that hypnotism is merely fear, adducing many interesting instances of the same, and it may be that the domestic hoodoo is founded upon such a basis. But what is there in a respectable-looking colored woman to bring various nationalities of men, women, and children under subjection? Even a horse maliciously nibbling a tree on the front pavement, listening to the "mantrim" she pronounced against his race, trotted off instanter and apparently warned all other horses, since no second one has attempted a trespass.

The most remarkable power possessed by this conjure queen is that of telepathically calling other colored women for work or for society. Often quite early in the morning she will announce:

"I fell languid. Cannot work today, but will call Hannah." Then to the dog:

"Go out and stay in the yard, so you can tell me when Hannah comes."

The dog obeys, and in a few moments loud barking indicates that Hannah is at the gate. After another little nap the edict goes forth—

"Henrietta had better bring home my dress," and before many minutes the neat little colored dressmaker trots in with profuse apologies and the new gown. Next it occurs to her that her clock is either too fast or too slow, so she goes to the fence and summons the householder on the other side to regulate it for her, which he agrees to do with the greatest politeness.

I had so often seen the clock go over the back fence that once I ventured to ask if Mr. Moss were a clockmaker.

"Oh, no," said the conjure queen, "he only fixes clocks for me."

"Don't you ever pay him?"

"Pay him!" she snorted, and gave a withering glance before which I fled.

On a sharp winter morning she announced: "The pipes are frozen and I am having water carried in."

From across the alley came a line of boys, girls and an Italian woman bringing up the rear, with pitchers, buckets and jugs. Mattie stood with her hands folded and her head thrown back marshaling them with her military eye. All bowed profoundly as she closed the gate on them after their services.

She is a tall woman and, summer or winter, always dresses in white, which is to say, wears a voluminous white apron completely covering her skirt and white kerchief crossed over her breast, the whole surmounted by a white cap.

Hardly had she solved the water problem when some carts arrived with coal from the mines, and these having no chutes, the question was how the coal was to be got into the cellar. Voicing this anxiety, Mattie waved me indoors.

"Drive up, son," she commanded, and fearing he was an Irishman and might brain her with his shovel, I retreated to a parlor window, whence I saw the cart drivers shoveling all the loads across the wide pavement and doing various other services which were certainly not in the contract.

I had long observed that market people, grocers, etc., would never differ with her even when they were right and she had been mistaken, and asking one with whom I was friendly why this was, he said: "Oh, there is no use in making her mad, she is queer."

Believing that a happy life consists in a prudent compromise, I ignored many of the mysteries, but one day I saw Mattie walking in the front door with a nicely browned chicken on a plate in her hand.

"I never cooked on a gas-stove before," she remarked, smiling, "so I went into Bedella's an' made her he't hers up fur me."

Bedella was a first-class cook from Ireland, and this was wash-day, yet the conjure queen still lived. It was said that Bedella was quite weak and nervous, however.

It would seem as though this hoodooist can call telepathically nearly every one she has seen or talked to. One Saturday afternoon she felt the need of a plumber. Very shortly, a plumber's boy came walking in. He said he would turn the water off and make repairs on Monday.

"You will fix it now," decided Mattie, and he did, though he lost his half holiday.

One day, feeling the need of fashionable society, the conjure queen asked my opinion as to whether a certain Miss Loui or a Mrs. Turner would most enliven her. I thought Mrs. Turner would be the most elegantly attired, but she was at Atlantic City.

"She'll have more news, so she'll have to come up," decided Mattie, and sure enough, about 7 p. m. Mrs. Turner arrived in black silk and rhinestones. I heard her say quite excitedly: "What is the matter? You kept calling and calling all afternoon, until I just had to drop everything and jump on the five o'clock train."

Except long silences with folded hands and bowed head there are no external indications of this occult power, though as a weather prophet she is infallible in prediction and has a knowledge of sun, moon and stars, and their movements which would put a high school graduate to the blush.

Biting the Nails.

There has been issued from the Paris press a brochure which created a large amount of interest in French medical circles, both on account of its originality and the experimental results which it embodies. It is from the pen of Dr. Edgar Berillon, so well known in the surgical world by reason of his connection with Charcot in the latter's hypnotic experiments, and as secretaire general de la Societe d'Hypnologie et de Psychologie of Paris, and medical inspector of the state lunatic asylums. The work is a scientific treatise on onycophagie, or finger biting, and contains the results of a series of observations in the public and private schools of France, and extending through a period of more than seven years. In his thorough scientific treatment of what the world has never before considered worthy of prolonged or special study Berillon arrived at results really remarkable. His experiments led him to pronounce the habit far more widespread and pernicious than others promptly treated, and forced him to conclude that, if not a disease itself, it is an unfailing mark of incipient degeneration of the nervous system, which, unrecognized, may be productive of the most evil results.—Dundee Adevertiser.

FREAK IN SEQUOIA FOREST

Tree Trunk That Has Stood for Sixteen Years Severed From Its Base.

Out in California there is a tree trunk which has stood for the last 16 years entirely severed from its base, says the Wide World Magazine. The stump is 15 feet in diameter, and the trunk towers 75 feet in the air. This remarkable freak is located near the Sequoia forest reserve in Tulare county, California, and was sawn off by lumbermen for timber. Through some miscalculation, when the cut was finished the tree still held its position, and dynamite was resorted to to bring it to the ground, which accounts for the deep gash on one side. After the first charge of the explosive had been ignited the tree still remained standing, and it was discovered that the entire trunk had been shattered by the discharge and was therefore useless for lumber. Accordingly, the work was stopped and the giant has remained upright, withstanding some of the severest wind storms that the state has known, held in its natural position by its great weight.

FALL PAINTING.

The majority of property owners are under the impression that spring time is the only painting time. But the fall of the year offers several advantages to the painter. One of the most important is that surfaces are almost sure to be dry, and there is no frost or inner moisture to work out after the paint is applied.

STOMACH LIVER LUNGS

Each of the chief organs of the body is a link in the Chain of Life. A chain is no stronger than its weakest link, the body no stronger than its weakest organ. If there is weakness of stomach, liver or lungs, there is a weak link in the chain of life which may snap at any time. Often this so-called "weakness" is caused by lack of nutrition, the result of weakness or disease of the stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition. Diseases and weaknesses of the stomach and its allied organs are cured by the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. When the weak or diseased stomach is cured, diseases of other organs which seem remote from the stomach but which have their origin in a diseased condition of the stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition, are cured also.

The strong man has a strong stomach. Take the above recommended "Discovery" and you may have a strong stomach and a strong body.

WEALTH OF LATIN AMERICA

BY HERBERT F. JACKSON

THE SPIRIT of internationalism in its broadest application was the pervading characteristic of relations between the various countries of America during 1908.

The year was marked by numerous gatherings of the representative elements of national life both in Latin America and the United States and on all occasions indications of a unanimity of sentiment and community of interest were markedly displayed.

Of paramount importance was the carrying into effect of the various conventions of the Washington Peace Conference of 1907 entered into by the republics of Central America. In accordance with these conventions the Central American court of justice held its first session in May, 1908, at Cartago, Costa Rica, the first judicial decision being rendered in December. On September 15 the Central American bureau was inaugurated in the capital of Guatemala for the furtherance of reciprocal interests among the nations of Central America and with the assembling of the first Central American conference at Tegucigalpa, Honduras, in the first month of 1909, additional emphasis is given to the intention of the nations interested to embrace all feasible means for the development of their material possibilities.

The participation of Pan-America was a feature of the Lake Mohonk conferences of 1908 and 1909 and active interest was indicated in such industrial assemblies as the International Fisheries congress, the Irrigation congress, the Trans-Mississippi Commercial congress, the Rivers and Harbors congress and the Conservation congress, all of which were held in the United States and attended by delegates from the republics to the south.

In the field of science the Fifth Pan-American Medical congress, meeting in Guatemala City during August, was an event of note, and the gathering of savants of the western hemisphere in Santiago de Chile in December, for the purpose of holding the first Pan-American Scientific congress, marked the entry of the United States into the realm of intellectual activity covered by the four Latin-American scientific congresses previously held. As a compliment to this co-operative action, Washington was selected for the next meeting place of the congress, in 1912.

Intellectual stimulus has been aroused through the holding of students' congresses and the year 1908 was marked by an increased number of Latin-American students in United States universities as well as by a vastly augmented interest on the part of the United States in the applied educational methods of Latin-American countries.

Not the least contributing factor in this interest is the better knowledge being daily acquired through the tide of travel which is setting toward Latin America and for which improved communication facilities are largely responsible.

With the assembling of the fourth International Conference of American States in Buenos Aires in 1910 the common interests of the American nations will be still further accentuated and the results of the previous meetings at Washington, Mexico and Rio de Janeiro reported on in the light of recent events demonstrating the status of America as a whole in world affairs.

The aggregate of trade for the various countries composing the International Union of American Republics during 1908 was $4,847,019,947, against $5,415,798,197 in the preceding year. This loss of over $550,000,000 is attributable to well-known economic causes which affected commercial centers throughout the world.

In the total for the year the share of the United States is represented by $2,869,282,928, composed of imports, $1,116,449,681, and exports $1,752,833,247, as compared with $3,346,596,025, composed of $1,423,169,820 and $1,923,426,205 for imports and exports, respectively, in 1907, a decrease of $477,313,097 being indicated.

Latin America figured in the grand total for $1,977,737,019, showing a decline of $89,647,589 in the trade volume as compared with the previous year.

Imports into all of Latin America during 1908 amounted in value to $893,253,998, against $1,000,297,852 in 1907, the indicated decline for this branch of trade being $107,043,854.

On the other hand exports with a total valuation of $1,084,483,021 show a gain of $15,578,701 over the figures for 1907, when Latin-American merchandise was shipped abroad to the value of $1,068,904,320.

From the foregoing statement it is seen that in spite of certain adverse conditions in the financial world the demand for articles of Latin-American origin created a trade balance in favor of the producing countries to the extent of $191,229,023, in which sum the exports for the year exceeded the imports.

In the year's trade total for Latin America the United States' share was $468,216,455, as compared with $558,279,201 in 1907, receipts of Latin-American merchandise figuring on the trade lists of the country for $271,498,425 and shipments of United States goods to those countries being represented by $196,718,030, as compared with imports worth $317,726,133 and exports $240,553,068 in 1907.

In considering the figures given above, adverse conclusions must not be drawn as to the value of the Latin-American field of trade. The falling off in the exchange of commodities for the year 1908 with the United States, as already suggested, was due almost entirely to unfavorable and unusual economic conditions. The reliable measure of such value is determined by comparing the statistics of the present with those of 10 years ago, and here a great increase is shown. The outlook for the coming year is good, and there is an awakening among business men in both North and South America to the possibilities of trade exchange heretofore undeveloped which must have a beneficial effect on Pan-American commerce.

THE SUNBEAM.

VOL. IX. SUNBEAM, RED LAKE COUNTY, MINNESOTA, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1909. NO. 27.

THE NEW GOVERNOR OF MINNESOTA

A. O. EBERHART.

WILL FOLLOW UP JOHNSON POLICIES

NEW STATE EXECUTIVE ANNOUNCES COURSE—APPOINTEES TO REMAIN.

WHILE STATE AND NATION MOURN

Thousands Pass the Bier of Dead Chieftain and Drop a Tear for the MAN They Dearly Loved.

Gov. Eberhart will continue the policies of John A. Johnson. He will remove none of the Johnson appointees from office, and even those members of Gov. Johnson's official family whose relations, political beliefs and personal relations with the former governor suggest their resignations, will stay with the new governor until Nov. 1.

After a conference with Frank A. Day, Governor Johnson's private secretary, Governor Eberhart announced that Mr. Day would remain as his private secretary until Nov. 1. Mr. Day, who had intended resigning at once, will remain at Governor Eberhart's personal request. His successor will not be named at this time.

"It would, of course, be impossible for me to remain Governor Eberhart's secretary," said Mr. Day.

In speaking of the situation Governor Eberhart said:

"It will be my aim to continue so far as is possible the policies of Governor Johnson. He was elected for a two-year term, and I am governor by accident."

The death of Governor Johnson puts an end to the democratic regime in the state of Minnesota and already the republican leaders of the state are planning to retain the strategetic position they have regained. There is a steady stream of callers on Governor Eberhart and there have already been applications for the positions which must be filled by the new governor.

Grimmer Likely to Remain.

Harvey Grimmer, executive clerk for Governor Johnson, may be retained by Governor Eberhart. Mr. Grimmer is a newspaper man. He was a republican when he took office under Governor Johnson. He was, of course, a Johnson supporter, but many of the state officials believe that Governor Eberhart would make a good political move in retaining him.

Legislation Would Help Widow.

If the probating of Governor John A. Johnson's estate shows that the late governor's property is not sufficient to keep Mrs. Johnson in comfortable circumstances, the Minnesota legislature may make an appropriation for her benefit. Senator A. D. Stephens, of Crookston, suggested that it would be appropriate for the legislature to take the necessary steps to provide for a suitable income for Mrs. Johnson.

Fred B. Lynch, democratic national committeeman, and Judge T. D. O'Brien, of the supreme court of Minnesota, are to be appointed administrators of the estate of John A. Johnson. Both were personal friends of the governor and they will perform their duties as a last tribute to their friend.

All of Governor Johnson's private papers are locked in a metal box in the vault in the governor's office in St. Paul. Until this vault is opened the value of the estate will not be known.

Governor Johnson's body left Rochester on a special train over the Great Western railway for St. Paul, accompanied by Mrs. Johnson, Fred Johnson, the governor's brother, Miss Margaret Sullivan, Frank A. Day, Fred B. Lynch, W. R. Wylie, of Minneapolis, colonel on the governor's staff, and Mayor Thompson, of Rochester, together with a committee of citizens of that city.

Many Thousands View the Body.

The scenes at the state capitol while the body lay in state were beyond description. The governor's body was removed from the private offices to the rotunda about 9:30, and the doors were opened to the public at 10:00 o'clock. From that time until 5:45, when the building was cleared for the coming of Mrs. Johnson, 45,000 people had taken a last look at the dead executive. At 7 o'clock the doors were opened again and before the building could be closed it is estimated that another 25,000 had gazed on the governor's countenance.

Mrs. Johnson came to the capitol at 5:35 o'clock. The clearing of the building began at 5:45 o'clock, and before 6 it was empty except for the handful of militiamen who composed the guard of honor. Mrs. Johnson came with her brother-in-law, Fred W. Johnson; Miss Margaret Sullivan, the friend who has been constantly at her side for days; her friend, Miss Reddy of Chicago; Mr. and Mrs. Hoke McCall and Mr. and Mrs. Briggs.

The body was taken from the University avenue entrance of the building. Preceded by the First regiment and the three batteries of artillery, a band formed from St. Paul Musicians union, and numbering nearly 100 led the procession.

The order of march was as follows: Band, military escort, St. Thomas Cadets, honorary pallbearers, hearse and active pallbearers, governor's staff, state officers, regents of the State university, members of the legislature, former state officials and legislative members, state employes, delegations, societies.

The committee appointed by Speaker Rockne yesterday to represent the house of representatives, is composed of the following: George N. Buck, Duluth; John Dalzell, Morton; F. J. Johnson, Fergus Falls; James Carley, Plainview; L. H. Johnson, Minneapolis; James Handlau, St. Paul; Elmer Kling, Little Falls; Ole Peterson, St. Peter; Dr. J. A. Gates, Kenyon; C. J. Swendsen, St. James.

The honorary pallbearers were Governor Eberhart, former Governors Hubbard, Lind, Nelson and Van Sant, Governor Burke of North Dakota, President Cyrus Northrop and Chief Justice Start. The active pallbearers were Fred B. Lynch, Frank A. Day, Justice Thomas D. O'Brien, Edward T. Young, A. C. Weiss of Duluth and John S. Wise of Mankato.

Eberhart Takes Oath.

A. O. Eberhart, of Mankato, has taken the oath of office as governor of the state of Minnesota. The oath was administered by Chief Justice Start in a consultation room of the supreme court.

The oath was administered to Mr. Eberhart in the presence of Justice Brown, Senator George F. Wilson, and Senator Ed E. Smith. of Minneapolis; Attorney General Simpson, Secretary of State Schmahl, State Treasurer Dinehart, Auditor Iverson, State Librarian King, and Assistant State Treasurer Pettijohn. A number of other friends of Governor Eberhart, also witnessed the ceremony. Chief Justice Start administered the oath, with the following brief statement:

"We have received the sad announcement of the death of our beloved Governor Johnson. By virtue of the constitution, the office devolves upon you as lieutenant governor."

Lieutenant Governor Eberhart raised his right hand, and in a profound silence Chief Justice Start administered the oath in a low voice.

"I took the oath of office today that I might issue a proclamation setting aside a day of mourning for Governor Johnson," said Governor Eberhart. "It was necessary also that I should sign requisition papers. I shall transact only such executive business as is absolutely necessary during the next few days."

Adolph O. Eberhart is the third of Minnesota's lieutenant governors to become governor because of a vacancy in the governor's chair, but the first to assume the office by reason of the death of his predecessor. The other governors who attained their office in this way were Henry A. Swift, in 1863, and David M. Clough, in 1895.

Henry A. Swift was a state senator when Lieutenant Governor Ignatius Donnelly was elected a member of congress. He was immediately chosen president of the senate and succeeded Governor Alexander Ramsey as governor when Governor Ramsey was elected a United States senator.

Lieutenant Governor Clough became governor when Governor Knute Nelson was chosen at United States senator in 1895.

Fourteenth Republican Governor.

In Mr. Eberhart the state has its fourteenth republican governor and its first republican governor since 1904.

Mr. Eberhart is a lawyer. He was born on a farm in the province of Vermland, Sweden, Thirty-nine years ago. In 1881 his parents came to Minnesota and he followed the following year. The family settled on a farm near Mankato. After living in Minnesota two years the father and mother moved to Nebraska.

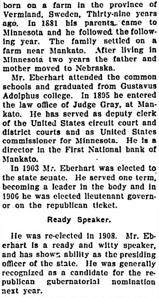
Mr. Eberhart attended the common schools and graduated from Gustavus Adolphus college. In 1895 he entered the law office of Judge Gray, at Mankato. He has served as deputy clerk of the United States circuit court and district courts and as United States commissioner for Minnesota. He is a director in the First National bank of Mankato.

In 1903 Mr. Eberhart was elected to the state senate. He served one term, becoming a leader in the body and in 1906 he was elected lieutenant governor on the republican ticket.

Ready Speaker.

He was re-elected in 1908. Mr. Eberhart is a ready and witty speaker, and has shown ability as the presiding officer of the state. He was generally recognized as a candidate for the republican gubernatorial nomination next year.

Senator E. E. Smith, president pro tem. of the senate, did not take the oath of office as lieutenant governor. Chief Justice Start directed attention to the vacancy in the office and to the fact that the position upon the president pro tem. of the senate, but Senator Smith stated that he had decided not to take the oath of office at this tiem, and Chief Justice Start indicated that this would be entirely satisfactory, so long as no other official duties were to be performed.



Lieut. Gov. E. E. Smith.

Mr. Smith, the new lieutenant governor, is 48 years old and is a native of Minnesota. He has represented the forty-third district in the senate for three terms and was a representative in the legislature of 1896 and 1897.

Mr. Smith was one of the leaders of the senate and his name has been mentioned in connection with the United States senatorship. He is married.

MINN. DOCTORS ARE AT WINONA

STATE MEETING OF DOCTORS TO BE HELD ON OCTOBER 12, 13 and 14.

AN ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT

Infantile Paralysis Will Be Featured in Discussion of the State Association.

Winona.—One of the big and important conventions to be held in Winona this fall will be that of the State Medical Association, scheduled for Oct. 12, 13 and 14. An attendance of several hundred physicians is expected.

Recognizing the importance of obtaining the latest and most complete information concerning the scourge of anterior poliomyolitis, which has been experienced in many sections of the state this summer, a symposium upon this topic has been arranged as the opening feature of the convention. The sub-topics will be: "Previous Outbreaks," Dr. Haldor Sneve, of St. Paul; "Minnesota Outbreaks of 1908," Dr. A. S. Hamilton, of Minneapolis. Several physicians will participate in the discussion, during which the epidrmiological, pathological and bacteriological data of recent outbreaks in Minnesota will be presented.

The address of the president of the association, Dr. Cornelius Williams, of St. Paul, will be made on Wednesday afternoon. Dr. Walter Wyman, surgeon general of the United States Public Health and Marine Service, will speak on "Administrative Problems in Relation to Public Health." This will be followed by a symposium on "Cooperation of State Forces in Minnesota Medicine," bringing out the relations between the different states bodies working for the promotion of health in Minnesota.

The closing day's session will open with a symposium on Ophthalmia neonatorum, in which James J. Dow, superintendent of the state school for the blind of Faribault, will be one of the speakers. Dr. Burnside Foster, of St. Paul, will also present a paper.

SWEDISH METHODISTS.

Pastors Named For Minnesota Churches.

Marquette, Michigan.—Because of a scarcity of clergymen, it has been necessary to increase the territory of a number of the ministers of the Northern Methodist conference, the sixteenth annual meeting of which has just been held at Ishpeming. There are now 70 churches and fewer than 50 ministers. The conference territory comprises Minnesota, Wisconsin and Upper Michigan.

Minneapolis—First Church, C. H. Sundstrom; Second church, William Lundin; Mission, North, Andrew Nelson. St. Paul—First church, John A. Wagner; Arlington Hill, Eric N. Hedeen. Afton—Adolph Carlson. ESTATE VALUED AT $15,000.

Governor Johnson's Property Is Estimated at That Figure.

St. Peter.—It is estimated that Governor Johnson left an estate valued at $15,000, which includes his house, said to be worth about $7,000; life insurance, $5,000, and $1,500 in cash, the balance being in various investments.

It was believed that the governor had accumulated a much larger fortune, especially when it is considered that he received $200 for every one of his Chautauqua lectures. It has been found, however, that most of this went for expenses.

In planning for the future it appears that the governor had decided to accept a proposition made by an Eastern lecture bureau, which had offered him $20,000 for a course of lectures extending over a period of six months. It was then his intention to tour Europe and gather more material for additional lectures.

WOOL IS GRADED IMPROPERLY.

Growers' Association Exposes Buyers Trick of Juggling State's Clip.

St. Paul.—Members of the Minnesota Sheep and Wool Growers' Association took advantage of the state fair to correct, as far as possible, the impression that exists among the wool consumers that Minnesota wool is far inferior to that of other states. President Magnus Brown says a gross injustice has been done the state by unscrupulous traders. As a result, the association is attempting to deal direct with the woolen mills.

There were four hundred odd head of sheep at the fair. Unconsciously they aided the association in its campaign of education. All they did was to stand in their pens and bleat and long for the green fields and sunshine instead of a great barn and staring thousands. Nevertheless, they have accomplished all the wool growers expected of them.

"Minnesota has been getting a black eye for years because of the juggling practiced by the manipulators of wool," said Mr. Brown, who was in charge of the wool demonstration booth. "I do not know why Minnesota was picked as the state to suffer, but it has been, and we are doing what we can to correct the impression. The biggest wool consumers—I mean the woolen mills—are in Philadelphia, Boston, and St. Louis. A week ago if any of these mill men had been asked what he thinks of Minnesota wool he would have said that it is far inferior to that of other states.

"Today a few of these mill men, in fact, every one who attended the state fair, has a different impression. We may not have the best wool in the country, but we are close to being in the front rank. It was the manipulators of the market who gave Minnesota its black eye.

"It has existed for years. It was a long time before we found out about it. They chose to boom Illinois and Wisconsin wool, as well as that of some other states, as the fancy pleased them. So they took the bright wool out of our bundles and threw it in with Illinois or Wisconsin wool and sold it as such after they had removed the dark wool from Illinois and Wisconsin bundles and thrown it in with the Minnesota wool.

"In a word, they took the best we had and gave it to other states, and took the worst other states had and gave it to us. Is it any wonder that the mill men look upon Minnesota wool with disfavor? I do not know just who are responsible. The wool has been passing through many hands. It is usual for the local buyer to buy from the farmer. He sells to the state buyer and the wool then is shipped, say to Philadelphia. There there are traders who juggle it back and forth very much as wheat is juggled on the board of trade.

"We wanted to show the mill men what Minnesota wool really is. Therefore we invited them to this fair, explaining what we had learned of the interchange of wool in transit. We had men here from Philadelphia and St. Louis. They have seen and are convinced. I hope they will spread the news. They have promised in future to deal direct with the Minnesota wool grower. The price of Minnesota wool has been kept down to such an extent that sheep-raising for wool purposes has not been a profitable investment to many."

CONVENTION DATES FIXED.

Executive Committee of Northwest-Central Minnesota Teachers Meets.

Breckenridge.—The executive committee of the Northwest-Central Minnesota Educational Association, which is composed of Superintendent A. S. Vail, president; Superintendent Charlotte Knudson, of Fergus Falls, vice-president, and Professor Edwin T. Reed, of the Moorhead normal school, met and fixed the dates for the 1910 meeting of the association on Thursday and Friday, Feb. 3 and 4. The general subject of the association's program will be "The Time Element in Education," and a speaker of national reputation will be secured for an evening address on the opening day. The meeting will be a joint gathering of teachers and school officers, and will enlist the co-operation of county and city superintendents, as well as the various educational institutions of Moorhead and Fargo.

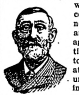
LITCHFIELD HOLDS MARKET DAY.

Farmers Enter Cattle for State Dairymen's Silver Cup Contest.

Litchfield.—In spite of the poor roads and bad weather, the monthly market day here was a big success, fully 1,500 persons attending. There was a fine display of homegrown vegetables, but interest centered in the livestock show, several farmers bringing cattle to compete for the handsome silver cup offered by the State Dairymen's Association for the best breeds of Holstein, Guernsey and Jersey cows. Professor George P. Grout of the state agricultural school acted as judge and made the award of prizes.

"Well, Miranda, they've found the north pole at last!"

"Sakes alive, Hiram! You don't say! Where did they find it?"



A GREAT ANNOYANCE.

Kidney Disease Shows Many Painful and Unpleasant Symptoms.

George S. Crowell, 1109 Broadway, Helena, Mont., says: "I was troubled with a disordered condition of the kidneys, some backache and irregular passages of secretions. At times I was obliged to get up out of bed at night, and the urine was unnatural in appearance. On the advice of a friend I procured Doan's Kidney Pills and began using them. This remedy helped me at once, strengthened my kidneys and corrected the disordered condition."

Remember the name—Doan's. Sold by all dealers. 50 cents a box. Foster-Milburn Co., Buffalo, N. Y.

His Proper Sphere.

Prince Bismarck was once pressed by a certain American official to recommend his son for a diplomatic place. "He is a very remarkable fellow," said the proud father; "he speaks seven languages." "Indeed," said Bismarck, who did not hold a very high opinion of linguistic acquirements; "what a wonderful head waiter he would make!"

DOCTOR ADVISED OPERATION

Cured by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Paw Paw, Mich.—"I suffered terribly from female ills, including inflammation and congestion, for several years. My doctor said there was no hope for me but an operation. I began taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and I can now say I am a well woman."
EMMA DRAPER.

Another Operation Avoided.

Chicago, Ill.—"I want women to know what that wonderful medicine, Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, has done for me. Two of the best doctors in Chicago said I would die if I did not have an operation, and I never thought of seeing a well day again. I had a small tumor and female troubles so that I suffered day and night. A friend recommended Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and it made me a well woman."—Mrs. ALVENA SPERLING, 11 Langdon St., Chicago, Ill.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, made from roots and herbs, has proved to be the most successful remedy for curing the worst forms of female ills, including displacements, inflammation, fibroid tumors, irregularities, periodic pains, backache, bearing-down feeling, flatulency, indigestion, and nervous prostration. It costs but a trifle to try it, and the result has been worth millions to many suffering women.

The hogs are jumping over the moon, and are way up above the reach of the poor man.

Anyone would notice by reading our exchanges, last week, that governor Johnson was dead.

President Taft would gained more friends, if he had kept out of Minnesota and kept his mouth shut on the tariff, for every time he tried to hide his head, he left his big carcass sticking out.

It remains to be seen, what if any changes will be made in the state appointative offices by Gov Ebehart, but there is likely to be some changes made to pay up political obligations, as he certainly was not elected by democratic votes.

"What is the matter with Minnesota republicans"? Ssays The Hallock Weekly News. Nothing at all Bro. Nelson, they are just getting woke up to the fact that there are some so-called republicans that need to be set down on, good and hard.

Just what stock the voters of the 2nd district take in president Taft will be seen when his and old Cannons man, Tawney, gets a hoist so far up salt creek that it will take him ten years to float down, the first time they get a chance to vote.

Down in Oklahoma, if a farmer digs an artificial lake on his land he is considerd a public benefactor, and gets a rebate on his taxes. In Minnesota if he digs a ditch to drain his own land and thus benefits the country he has to pay more taxes.

Now that John King, of Red Lake Falls has had a good long feed at the public crib, why not give John Eastman, of Thief River Falls a taste of the corn? With Duffy and Eastman in St. Paul, Red Lake county would attract more attention than any other county in the northern part of the state.

The new Soo line from Duluth to Plumner goes to far south to be of any benefit to the Eleven Towns, but it does strike a territory in northeastern Polk and a part of Clearwater county that were more badly in need of a railroad than we are here, as they have been hawling their produce from 20 to 30 miles to market for a good many years, and we congratulate them on geting a good railroad through their part of the country.

Last week the county board of Red Lake connty let the contract for a new court house, to cost $15,831. It will not be a very costly building but it looks big to Red Lake Falls people, and its construction probably will be the means of keeping the county seat at Red Lake Falls permanently.—Norman County Index.

Go away from home, if you want to hear the news, but as a matter of fact there is no attempt being made to movs any county seats in this county now. It seems to us that we did hear that Thief River Falls was going to try to move the county seat up there, but guess they concluded not to move it at the present time.

In the Old Germanic Wilderness.

Leaving Hummelsee on a misty morning, we enter a green underworld of strange dew bediamond brilliance, skirt the head of a deep southward looking valley and emerge upon a sunny open plateau beyond Eckle and look down upon Wildsee, circled by the dark pines of an untouched forest that stretches away to the blue and distant hills. It is easy here to imagine yourself back in the heart of the old Germanic wilderness. In the heroic days when Hagen slew Siegfried with a coward's blow. The morning sun glints upon bright spear tops among the trees and the wind brings snatches of rough war songs shouted by barbarian voices. Your heart swells with the lust of battle and the chase, and if you have German blood in your veins it calls back through the dark middle ages to that dim and mystic youthday of the world when heroes met at the Ravenna Schlacht. Within the hour you find yourself back in the twentieth century among motorcars drawn up beside the hostelry at Ruhestein, where the Hohenweg drops into the commonplace and crosses the government macadam before climbing the steep side of the Rothe Schliffkopf.—From "A Black Forest Pathway," by Frederick Van Beuren, Jr., in Scribner's.

Verdi and Bismarck on Titles.

The composer Verdi was offered a title of nobility by King Victor Emmanuel. It was intended that he should be created Marquis or Comte de Busseto, after the estate upon which he lived. The composer refused the offer energetically. He considered that Verdi was somebody and that the Marquis de Busseto would be nobody.

Even Bismarck was unable to parry a blow of this character. When the young emperor broke with him he conferred upon him the title of Duke of Lauenbourg. Bismarck received the parchment with this exclamation:

"A pretty name! It will be handy for traveling incognito."

Some days after a parcel arrived at Varzin bearing the address "Mme. la Duchesse de Lauenbourg."

Bismarck, to whom it was delivered, being then at table, arose and, offering the letter to his wife, remarked ironically:

"Duchess, enchanted to make your acquaintance!"

Faithful to His Trust.

I was waiting near the elevator in the factory building for my friend to come down when I noticed a small boy sitting in one corner of the hall holding a large, thick sandwich. He eyed the sandwich lovingly for a long time, then he carefully lifted off the top slice of bread, took out a piece of dill pickle, ate it and replaced all as before. In a few seconds he again removed the top piece, extracted a piece of pickle and a piece of meat and replaced the top. Again and again the performance was repeated until all the pickle and almost all the meat were gone, the sandwich, however, appearing intact as in the beginning.

"Why don't you eat up your sandwich and not pick at it in that way?" I asked the boy with some curiosity.

"Why," he answered, looking up with great innocence, "it ain't my sandwich."—Woman's Home Companion.

Where Women Swim Best.

"The Korean women are the best swimmers in the world," said a lifeguard. "The Korean pearl diving is in their hands. They swim—they don't boat—they swim out to the pearl fisheries of Quelpart, lugging baskets with them. After this swim of half an hour they dive down fifty feet and fetch up queer one shelled pearl oysters as big as babies. They dive till their baskets are full—the baskets are corked to keep them afloat—and after three or four hours' work they swim back home with their catch. The big one shelled oysters are valuable as pearl mines and as food too. A half dozen Koreans will sit down to an oyster as gayly as you or I sit down to a broiled lobster. Sometimes when the great shellfish is eaten raw it quivers and moans slightly as the knife is plunged into it."—Philadelphia Bulletin.

The Man and the Lion.

"When I was once in danger from a lion," said an old African explorer, "I tried sitting down and staring at him, as I had no weapons."

"How did it work?" asked his companion.

"Perfectly. The lion didn't even offer to touch me."

"Strange! How do you account for it?"

"Well, sometimes I've thought it was because I sat down on a branch of a very tall tree."

Very Queer.

"My husband has been out late every evening this week attending important club meetings."

"Yes, so has mine. They belong to the same club, you know."

"Why, how queer! My husband says he hasn't seen your husband in six months!"—Cleveland Leader.

A WEST POINT HAZING

It Knocked All the Egotism Out of the New Cadet.

SINGING HIS OWN PRAISES.

He Was Kept at It to His Own Mortification and the Delight of the Upper Class Men—A Clipping From His Home Paper Started the Trouble.

Hazing at the United States Military academy, West Point, has in the past ten years been so frequently followed by punishment and otherwise discountenanced that it has practically become a thing of the past. A third of a century ago the modes of hazing were varied and many of them unique. A certain graduate who hailed from south of Mason and Dixon's line and from west of the Allegheny mountains told this story of his own experience:

He was a tall, rawboned fellow when he entered the academy as a "plebe" and had been assigned to a room with a bright little chap, with whom he soon became very friendly and confidential. Several weeks after he had entered the academy he received a letter from his good mother, in which she had inclosed a clipping from their county newspaper.

The article mentioned the fact that young Mr. —— had received an appointment to West Point and had left for that place several days before; that, whereas they extended congratulations to the young man, the United States government was to be much more greatly congratulated upon obtaining as one of its embryo soldiers a man from their community, the son of such a noble sire, whose sire and great-sires had been equally noble, a young man above reproach, of great intellect and bound to make his mark in any calling he might elect, etc.

This article inspired its recipient with pride and pleasure. He found it impossible to refrain from showing it to his roommate and an hour after having done so was accosted while going downstairs by an upper class man who had been drilling him and had been very severe. At this meeting the upper class man, who was about half his size, looked at him solemnly, removed his cap and said: "Mr. ——, I humbly beg your pardon for having been so stern with you. I did not know until a few moments ago what a distinguished and intellectual young man you were. You honor us by becoming one of us."

The pleased "plebe," never for a moment scenting mischief, grinningly replied: "That's all right, Mr. ——. I forgive you."

That evening while the "plebe" and his roommate were engaged in study there was a knock at their door, and there entered the upper class man who had accosted and apologized to the "plebe" on the stairs, he being accompanied by a dozen other upper class men. He thus addressed the "plebe:" "Mr. ——, here are a number of your brother cadets who are desirous of knowing what a particularly distinguished man they have among them. You will therefore kindly read what your newspaper says of you."

The "plebe" was inclined to demur, but the determined manner and steely eye of the little upper class man compelled obedience. Embarrassed, he stumblingly read the whole article, at the conclusion of which the little upper class man stated that the reader had mumbled in parts, had failed to enunciate distinctly and required the poor "plebe" to read it again. This having been done, all shook hands with him in an apparently most deferential manner, after which the little upper class man stated that they would call the next evening augmented by other cadets and that in the meantime the "plebe" would commit the article to memory and be in readiness to repeat it when they called.

His manner brooked no disobedience. The call was made the next evening, the number of cadets being nearly double that of the previous evening, and he repeated the article, being prompted by the little upper class man. Before the departure of his visitors he was informed that he would be visited the next evening by a still greater number of cadets, and he was ordered to be prepared to declaim the article depicting his virtues.

The visit was made and the declamation tendered. He was then informed that he would be again visited the following evening and would prepare himself so as to be able to render the article in song. This visit was made, the room being fairly packed with cadets, and the poor "plebe" was required to stand on a table and howl the article from start to finish, for he had not the faintest understanding of how to sing or turn a tune. In after years he said that if he had ever had any egotism in his composition it was completely knocked out of him by having to handle that article as he had to handle it.—J. W. Duncan in Lippincott's.

Three Tightwads.

Speaking of tightwads, a Texas paper says: It is reported that three of the stingiest men in the state were in town yesterday. One of them will not drink as much water as he wants unless it is from another man's well. The second forbids any of his family from writing anything but a small hand, as it is a waste of ink to make large letters. The third stops his clock at night in order to save wear and tear on the machinery. All of them decline to take their county paper on the ground that it is a terrible strain on their spectacles to read newspapers even in the daytime.

COWED BY MOSQUITOES.

A Clergyman's Experience on a British Columbia Trip.

In 1860 the Rev. John Sheepshanks, later on the bishop of Norwich, was traveling through British Columbia. His book, "A Bishop In the Rough," relates his experiences on the Douglas trail, where the greatest discomfort was caused by the swarms of ferocious mosquitoes. He met with Indians covered with paint, carrying branches of trees in their hands, which they were sweeping around them as they walked. They were evacuating their country, being temporarily driven out by these pests. If by chance a traveler arrived at a clearing or an open space where there appeared to be an immunity from them, ere long they would appear.

"Quite early in the morning after meeting those Indians I issued from my tent and found an open space on the river's side where I could get my bath. But no sooner had I emerged from the water than I found swarms of mosquitoes assailing me, and, do what I would, slaughter them by dozens, I suffered severely.

"It was on that same day, dining at a wayside house, that I took part in a scene which I can never forget. There were twenty-five men going up to the mines. Food was on the table. There was a ceaseless hum in the apartment, for it was literally brown with thousands of mosquitoes.

"It was swelteringly hot, yet every man had made himself as impervious as he could. Each man wore his coat buttoned up, strings were fastened round his cuffs, and trousers also if he had not on top boots. They had gauntlets on their hands, their hats were on, and veils hanging down covered face and neck. A man would stick his fork into a piece of meat and pop in under the veil as quickly as possible. When drinking their coffee the men would hold the cup underneath the veil, first clearing out the bodies of the mosquitoes which possibly had been feeding upon the hairy miner close at hand.

"Not a word was uttered during that brief meal, for we were beaten down and cowed by the insects. The first words spoken were by a miner in pushing away his chair from the table, 'Oh, this God forsaken country!'"

NOT FOND OF PIGEONS

Mayor of Philadelphia Resents Interference in His Efforts to Get Rid of Them.

Mayor Reyburn, who considers the city hall pigeons a nuisance, and would rid the building of them if he could, considers the efforts of the anticruelty to animals societies to prevent the pigeons being driven out as meddlesome, and sometimes waxes sarcastic in referring to the societies.

Recently, while the mayor was holding his daily chat with the newspaper men, several fire engines with clanging gongs, came thundering down Broad street and around the city hall. The pigeons, evidently frightened by the gongs, flew excitedly around and around outside of the mayor's office on the north side of the building.

As the whir of wings swept through the room, the mayor exclaimed, half smiling, but with an attempt at seriousness:

"My! The fire engines are disturbing the pigeons. Where is the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals? Such a trifle as saving citizens' property from burning should not be allowed to interfere with the peace of the pigeons."—Philadelphia Times.

Eczema on Hand, Arms, Legs and Face—It Was Something Terrible.

Complete Cure by Cuticura.

"About fifteen or eighteen years ago eczema developed on top of my hand. It burned and itched so much that I was compelled to show it to a doctor. He pronounced it ringworm. After trying his different remedies the disease increased and went up my arms and to my legs and finally on my face. The burning was something terrible. I went to another doctor who had the reputation of being the best in town. He told me it was eczema. His medicine checked the advance of the disease, but no further. I finally concluded to try the Cuticura Remedies and found relief in the first trial. I continued until I was completely cured from the disease, and I have not been troubled since. C. Burkhart, 236 W. Market St., Chambersburg, Pa., Sept. 19, 1908."

"Filthy Lucre."

The expression "filthy lucre" is of Biblical origin, and is to be found in the third chapter of the first book of Timothy, where the qualifications necessary for the office of a bishop are thus set forth: "This is a true saying. If a man desireth the office of bishop, he desireth a good work. A bishop must then be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant, sober, of good behavior, given to hospitality, apt to teach; not given to wine, no striker, not greedy of filthy lucre; but patient, not a brawler, not covetous."

WOULD ELIMINATE THE ERROR COLUMN

Cut out the error column.

This is the suggestion of Fred Tenney, famous first baseman, once manager of the Boston National league club and now with the New York Giants.

By the elimination of this column in the tabulated score, with the exception of wild throws on which base runners advance an extra base, this veteran believes than another step forward would be made. His idea, when carefully considered, presents conditions that are worthy of thought.

"How many times are batters robbed of what are almost sure base hits?" says Tenney. "This is especially true in line drives to the infielders. No great credit is due the infielder for getting these balls, as a rule, for they are shot straight at him. Of course, there are exceptions, as there are to almost everything, but that is the rule. As a matter of fact the batsman is almost entitled to a hit. Surely he hit the pitcher hard enough to get one, but the luck of the game, that cuts such an important figure in baseball, happens in that instance to be against him.

"So I figure that if the error column, so far as fumbled balls or bad throws to a baseman are concerned, was eliminated, making everything a hit, it would only just about even up for those infield line drives that the batter loses because the infielder happens to be right in front of a hard-hit ball driven straight into his hands.

"Naturally the scoring of a fielder's choice would remain just as it is today, for the batsman is not entitled to a hit where the infielder makes the play on some other base-runner when the batsman could have been thrown out at first. Again, there must be some way of scoring extra bases taken by a runner on a bad throw. For that I would leave the error column in the box score, but it would represent wild throws, not fumbled balls, or a bad throw to first on a batted ball.

"This would naturally make some difference in the batting and fielding averages of the players, but I don't think it would boost any batsman very much, while it would take away that excuse for a fielder shirking a hard chance for fear he might be penalized for a misplay. There are some such men playing the game, you know, though one of that kind is never a high-class performer.

"It wouldn't take long for those who are watching the batting averages closely to figure out the difference this change would make in the hitting of a player. And, I say, why should a batter be penalized by having a hit taken away from him when he manages to hit the ball in such a way that an infielder musses it up? Rather, I think, to do justice on all sides, a base hit should be credited.

"No one who follows baseball closely ever thinks of judging a player's ability in the field by the official fielding averages. We all know well that a good player goes after everything within reach, never fearing a possible error through a fumble or a bad throw to first. He is there to try to make the play, to get everything he can get his hands on, and if he shirks because he is afraid of that error, then he isn't going to get lots of balls that he might have handled cleanly and gone through with for a put-out. The present fielding averages are practically worthless, for it is almost always that the best players have the lowest percentage, while those who don't or can't cover much ground get away with the fewest errors and, therefore, are at the top in the averages. Hence, in picking young ball players, scouts judge by what they see them do, not by what they read in the fielding averages.

"I believe that such a change in the scoring rules would make good ball players of some of the poorer ones, and that it would make still better performers of the best of them. To me it looks as though it would be a step in the right direction, keeping pace with the rapid advances now being made in baseball. No one would be hurt, while both batsmen and fielders would be benefited.

"I would like to see the Baseball Writers' Association of America take this question up at its meeting this winter and present it to the joint rules committee of the National and American leagues for serious consideration."

CRACK KANSAS CITY PITCHER

GRIDIRON GOSSIP

Seven of last year's Pennsylvania team will be missing this fall.

Yale's call by Capt. Coy has been sent out, although the quarterbacks, including Corey, French and Johnson, started work at Greenport, L. I., some time ago. There will be more than seventy men in the full squad.

T. A. Butkiewicz, former guard and tackle at Princeton and Pennsylvania, has been engaged to take charge of the Princeton squad, his attention being particularly directed to the line men.

Princeton has lost by graduation Tibbott, Eddie Dillon, Booth and Dowd, but has a wealth of good material to fill these and other places.

Havana will enjoy a big boom in football sport this fall. The last game scheduled this year is between Rollins college and University of Havana on December 25.

PAINT FAULTS.

It is a common occurrence nowadays to hear a man remark with disgust: "It is impossible to have good painting done these days; either the paint is not good or there are no good painters." This, however, is not true. There is good paint, and there are good painters. But the question is, bringing them together.

One cannot expect a satisfactory painting job without pure white lead. There is a way to make sure you are getting pure white lead without testing it. See that the keg bears National Lead Company's famous Dutch Boy Painter trademark, which is a positive guarantee of purity. However, anyone can test white lead. National Lead Company, 1902 Trinity Bldg., New York City, will send you a lead tester and painter's outfit, consisting of book of color schemes, specifications, etc., upon request.

As St. Louis Lawyers Talk.

Circuit Judge Reynolds had announced that he would hear jurors who had excuses to offer for not serving, and a dozen American citizens crowded up to the bench to tell their troubles. Their excuses were as varied as those who were bidden to the feast that the Bible tells about. One had an important engagement and another could not hear very well, and another had sickness in his family, and another had duties to perform which nobody else on earth could perform, and another was going on a journey. And so it went.

The last man in the line wanted to be let off because he was a German. He might have been excused if he had not presented his excuse wrong end forward.

"Judge," he said, "I can't understand good English."

"Oh, you'll do all right," said the judge. "There is no good English spoken in here."—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

They Didn't Have to Change.

During the years in which our pure food laws have been put into effect there has been a great hurrying and scurrying on the part of the food manufacturers to change their methods to make them conform to the law.

The Quaker Oats Company is a conspicuous exception. It was admitted that Quaker Oats was as pure and clean as possible and that it was an ideal food.

It is so cheap that any one can afford it and so nourishing that everyone needs it. The result of last year's experiments at Yale and other points where food values were tested is that Quaker Oats has been adopted by many persons as their food on which they rely for adding vigor and endurance of muscle and brain.

The Quaker Oats Company meets all demands in the way it packs Quaker Oats; regular size packages and the large size family package; the latter, both with and without china. 4

Mars the Next Field.

There are many who will part from the north pole with regret. All their lives it has seemed the one unconquerable salient of nature's fortress, the very synonym of the impossible goal of human endeavor. With the pole itself succumbing, the world is no longer the same, and everything seems within the realm of mortal achievement. We must now think of talking with Mars with more respect. The professor's mirrors may prove any day a reality.

FAVORED DOGS IN GERMANY

Dachshund Is the Most Popular Variety, the English Bulldog Being Second Choice.

The dachshund is the favorite dog in Germany, and a very useful and pleasant companion he seems to be. The English bulldog is a good second in popularity, and the nearer he is to our standard points the better he is liked. The fox terrier varies a good deal in size and marking and is evidently not so well known in Germany as he deserves to be.

The ladies there are as fond of their little Poms and their King Charleses as are their English sisters of their pet dogs at home.

Some few dogs in the streets are harnessed to four wheeled trucks. Usually a man and a dog pull. The work seemed too heavy and exhausting for the dogs, which are generally mongrels of the mastiff type. They look in fair condition and are not ill treated.—Farm and Home.

Sheer white goods, in fact, any fine wash goods when new, owe much of their attractiveness to the way they are laundered, this being done in a manner to enhance their textile beauty. Home laundering would be equally satisfactory if proper attention was given to starching, the first essential being good Starch, which has sufficient strength to stiffen, without thickening the goods. Try Defiance Starch and you will be pleasantly surprised at the improved appearance of your work.

VOL. IX. SUNBEAM, RED LAKE COUNTY, MINNESOTA, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1909. NO. 28.

RALPH W. WHEELOCK

GOVERNOR EBERHART APPOINTS FORMER NEWSPAPER MAN AS DAY'S SUCCESSOR.

DECLINED BY CHARLES MITCHELL

Who Was Political Manager for Robert C. Dunn in His Race Against the Late Governor Johnson.

Minneapolis.—Ralph W. Wheelock, of Minneapolis, has been named as private secretary to Governor Adolph O. Eberhart. He will succeed Frank A. Day, who will retire Nov. 1.

The choice of Mr. Wheelock was made at a conference in the office of A. A. Eberhart, Governor Eberhart's brother. Present at the conference were Governor Eberhart, Lieutenant Governor E. E. Smith, and other republican leaders.

Mr. Wheelock has been prominent in the fight for the private secretaryship from the start. After a conference in St. Paul last week, the place was offered first to Charles S. Mitchell, of Duluth, with the understanding that Mr. Wheelock was to have the place should Mr. Mitchell refuse. After a talk with Robert C. Dunn, of Princeton, whose political manager Mr. Mitchell was in the Dunn-Johnson gubernatorial campaign, Mr. Mitchell decided that he would not accept the place. In this decision he followed Mr. Dunn's advice, and his own private wish not to re-enter politics. The decision of Mr. Mitchell made Mr. Wheelock's appointment a certainty.

Wheelock Best Man.

In announcing the appointment of Mr. Wheelock, Governor Eberhart said: "I have chosen Mr. Wheelock because I believe him to be the best man for the place. He is not entangled with any political faction, and has been allied with no political interest or interests."

Mr. Wheelock is now engaged in the advertising business in Minneapolis, but as a newspaper man he has worked on many of the twin city papers, and before he came to Minneapolis conducted a newspaper in South Dakota. He was private secretary to Mayor David P. Jones, of Minneapolis.

St. Paul.—Harvey Grimmer has declined to be Governor Eberhart's executive clerk.

In a signed statement, Mr. Grimmer, who, although he is a Republican, has been a staunch supporter of the late Governor Johnson, says that Governor Eberhart asked him to remain as his executive clerk, but because of the light he had been placed in by certain members of the press, inference having been made that his acceptance of favors by the new governor would be construed as a surrender of loyalty to the memory of one to whom he was so close, he thinks it is his duty to retire.

INAUGURAL AT CARLETON.

Dr. Donald Cowling Will be Installed President Oct. 18.

Northfield.—Dr. Donald J. Cowling, the newly elected president of Carleton college of Northfield will be formally inaugurated on Monday, Oct. 18. The ceremonies will begin at 10 a. m., when the inaugural procession, composed of the students and faculty of Carleton college, together with invited guests, will leave the campus and proceed to the First Congregational church, where the exercises will be held.

The installation will be performed by the president of the board of trustees, William Laird, of Winona. This will be followed by a brief speech of acceptance by President Cowling. Speeches of greeting will then be made by presidents of the University of Minnesota, Beloit college and Grinnell college. These will be followed by brief remarks by the alumni and faculty members, after which the inaugural address will be delivered.

LITTLE BOY HANGS HIMSELF.

Noose About Neck Causes Strangulation When He Falls.

Duluth.—While he was playing on the veranda in rear of his home, Ferris Buchner, the 5-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Buchner, of Proctor, accidentally hanged himself.

The child was playing with a noose made of heavy cord. He attached the cord to a nail on the post of the veranda and tied the noose about his neck. He was running about the veranda playing horse, when he slipped and fell off the edge.

The noose instantly tightened about his neck and he was strangled before he could make an outcry. His mother went out on the veranda a few minutes later and found her boy's dead body dangling to the rope.

FOR CLOSER ORGANIZATION.

Catholic Societies to Bond Together Closer.

Winona.—The Minnesota State Federation of German Catholic societies decided to make their organization more effective in the state by the establishment of districts and the pointment of a committee to work out a plan was authorized. A per capita tax of 25 cents for the support of the central verein was voted.

It was decided to appoint a committee to make out a list of hotels and lodging places in the large cities in the state for young people of both sexes, so they may easily find lodgings that will not be detrimental to their moral character.

Lecturers of prominence are to be invited to deliver a cours of lectures at St. Paul this winter on social reform.

Resolutions of condolence were adopted on the death of Bishop Cotter, Governor Johnson and John S. Grode, who was president of the state federation.

Secretary W. Elbner, of New Ulm, reported 126 societies in Minnesota affiliated with the state organization, and a membership of 10,281.

Rev. Father Alfred Meier, of St. Paul, who was one of the twelve delegates from Minnesota to the annual convention of the German Catholic central verein at Indianapolis last week, made an interesting report.

Addresses were made by Joseph Matt, of St. Paul; Rev. Bernard Sandmeyer, of New Ulm, and George Stelzle, of Minneapolis.

The officers elected for the federation follow: President, Paul Kemp, Winona; financial secretary, William Elbner, New Ulm; recording secretary, Frank Jungbauer, St. Paul; treasurer, Martin Walser, Mankato; executive committee: Rev. Mr. Wurst, Wabasha; Rev. Pauline Wiesner, Stillwater; George N. Gerlach, St. Paul; John Q. Juenemann, St. Paul; George Stelzle, Minneapolis; delegates to the annual convention of the central verein: Joseph Matt, George N. Gerlach, Will Elbner, John Jueneman, Rev. P. Pauline, Weisner, George Stelzle, Rev. P. Alfred Meier, Rev. John Meier, Peter M. Kersta and Rev. M. Wurst. Alternates are: Rev. Mr. Vandenberg, Rev. P. Schirmers, John A. Schroeder, Rev. H. Smalian, John Elden.

Benevolent Society Elects.

The first matter before the Benevolent society, which convention followed immediately after the federation session, was the election of officers as follows:

President—George N. Gerlach, St. Paul.

Vice-President—Rev. Pauline Wiesner, Stillwater.

Secretary—John Q. Juenemann, St. Paul.

Treasurer—John A. Schoeder, Minneapolis.

Stillwater gets the 1910 convention.

ESTATE IS PROBATED.

Value of Late Executive's Property Exceeds All Estimates.

St. Paul, Minn.—Governor Johnson's estate exceeds in amount all estimates advanced by his nearest friends. The governor's property holdings as shown in the petition for the appointment of administrators filed in the Ramsey county probate court, amount to $37,430, the major part of which is listed as "stocks."

The items are:

Household goods	$ 2,500
Stocks	23,000
Notes and bonds	2,330
One lot and building	7,600
Miscellaneous	2,000
Total	$37,430

The petition is signed by the late governor's widow, Elinore Marie Johnson, who in the will is named as executrix and is the sole heir. Mrs. Johnson petitioned for the appointment of Thomas D. O'Brien, justice of the state supreme court, and Frederick B. Lynch, as general administrators. Judge Bazille signed an order appointing Mr. Lynch special administrator, pending the hearing on the appointment of the general administrators which will take place Oct. 25.

CITY TO BUY WATER PLANT.

Condemnation Proceedings and a Bond Issue Authorized.

Brainerd.—The Brainerd city council authorized the sale of $57,500 in waterworks bonds for the purchase of the plant of the Minnesota Water Works Company under condemnation proceedings now pending. The bonds will be of the denomination of $1,000 each, and will bear 5 per cent interest.

Al bids must be accompanied by a certified check on a local bank for 5 per cent of the amount of the bid and the bidder must take the bonds within thirty days of the date of sale.

The city wishes to take over the plant prior to Jan. 1, 1910, so as to get the rentals for the quarter commencing on that date.

BALLOONIST FALLS IN RIVER

CAPT. BALDWIN PLUNGES INTO HUDSON FROM AIR.

Wilbur Wright and Glenn Curtiss Make Successful Flights at New York.

New York.—The first day of flight of the Hudson-Fulton celebration Wednesday was a victory for the heavier-than-air machine. Wilbur Wright successfully circled the great statue of Liberty at the entrance of New York harbor, in his aeroplane, but two huge dirigible balloons, in the upper part of the city, failed in their task.

Both Wright and Glenn H. Curtiss soared succesfully from the aerodrome on Governors Island in their motor-propelled biplanes; both great dirigibles, manned respectively by Capt. Thomas Baldwin and George L. Tomlinson and entered in the New York World's $10,000 New York-to-Albany race, were forced to descend because of mechanical difficulties before they were well under way.

Wilbur Wright made three sensational flights and Curtiss made one brief though successful test spin of 30 seconds' duration. Baldwin with his dirigible landed in the Hudson river less than an hour after the start, while Tomlinson, after remaining in the air from 11:36 a. m. until 1:30 p. m., came to earth near White Plains, N, Y., 22 miles from his starting point. Neither of the dirigible pilots was injured nor was either craft seriously damaged.

New York.—A night carnival parade of many novel features was the concluding event of Children's day in the Hudson-Fulton celebration Saturday. This pageant was of a generally allegorical and legendary nature. Its bearing upon the events of the week was the representation it gave of arts and ideals that contributed to America's present civilization and culture.

In the planning and construction of these 50 floats the German, Austrian and Swiss societies of the city cooperated with the carnival committee and the Teutonic mythology which the early colonists brought to this part of the country was strongly in evidence. But the classic legends of Greece and Rome were not lacking, and a large number of the floats represented abstract subjects such as Poetry, Music, Art, War, Humor, Good Luck, Freedom and Peace.

FEARS WATER SITE TRUST

Pinchot Asserts Congress Must Take Drastic Action to Defeat Power Grabbers.

Washington.—Unequivocally asserting that a monopoly now is in process of formation whose object is to obtain possession of the water power sites of the country, Gifford Pinchot, chief of the bureau of forestry, who returned from an extended inspection in the west, declared that remedial legislation must be enacted at the coming session of congress if this great natural resource is to be preserved to the people.

The problem of how best to prevent the nation's water power sites from being gobbled up by such combinations, Mr. Pinchot predicted will be one of the biggest issues which the next session of congress will have to thresh out.

MINER IS LOST IN DESERT

Stakes His Life on the Turn of a Coin and Loses.

Los Angeles, Cal. — David Eldridge, the mine owner who disappeared in the desert several weeks ago, staked his life on the toss of a coin and lost, according to Malapai Mike, a prospector, who says he was the last to see the missing man. Parties have searched the desert in vain for Eldridge and have given him up for dead.

Mike came here from Greenwater. He says he and Eldridge, who was the son of Benjamin Eldridge, a wealthy Illinois sewing machine manufacturer, started for Telescope peak to inspect a power site. On the way they lost most of their provisions and all but one of their burros. When their water supply was reduced to five gallons Mike says Eldridge suggested the tossing of a coin to see which should take the burro and make a dash for Greenwater for aid. Mike won and taking one gallon of water left his companion.

On arriving at Greenwater he sent a party in search of the missing man, but no trace of him was found.

FIGHT FOR LIFE IN LAKE

Three Occupants of Crippled Launch Rescued Almost Overcome by Cold.

Chicago. — Two men and a boy in a gasoline launch were rescued after a 14-hour battle with the waves of Lake Michigan, in which they were almost overcome by cold. The engine of their craft was broken and they were unable to propel the boat. When the life-savers, under the direction of Capt. Charles Carlin, reached them, the exhausted victims were ready to give up their struggle. They are H. Rohrbok, C. A. Rohrbok, his son, and Frank Macey of Saugatuck, Mich., who left there a few days ago for a pleasure cruise.

They were about two miles out in the lake when the engine broke and water poured into the rolling boat.

Young Rohrbok used a pail to bail out the craft. In trying to throw it to Macey the vessel was lost in the lake.

All then used their hats as dippers to rid the launch of water. They sought to attract the attention of rescuers by pouring gasoline on garments and burning them, but their matches were blown out by the wind.

All night they fought the waves and young Rohrbok fell to the bottom of the boat exhausted.

As a last resort the men tied a shirt to an oar carried for emergency and this signal was seen by a man of Capt. Carlin's crew in a watch tower.

The life-savers launched a boat and hurried to the rescue.

RAILROAD IS FINED $1,000

Southern Pacific Enters Plea of Technical Guilt of Rebating—Maximum Penalty $20,000.

Los Angeles, Cal. — The Southern Pacific railroad pleaded guilty in the United States district court to rebating and was fined $1,000 by Judge Wellborn.

Through Attorney C. M. Durbrow of San Francisco, the company entered a plea of technical and unintentional guilt. The maximum penalty would have been $20,000.

WHITNEY KNEW ALL

DR. COOK'S STATEMENTS CORROBORATED BY BIG GAME HUNTER.

COOK'S ESKIMOS ARE PUMPED

Asked Whitney What Peary's Men Were Trying to Make Them Say—Deny Cook Did Not Go out of Sight of Land.

St. John's N. F.—Harry Whitney, of New Haven, who arrived here from Labrador on the steamer Jeanie, says he has no reason for doubting that both Cook and Peary reached the pole.

Mr. Whitney was questioned regarding the statements made to him by Dr. Frederick A. Cook in Greenland. He said Cook arrived at Annotok in April of this year and declared that he had reached the north pole a year before. He pledged Whitney, however, not to tell Commander Peary, who was to be informed only that Cook had gone farther north than Peary's previous record, 87 degrees 6 minutes. Continuing, Dr. Cook told Whitney that he had accomplished all he expected to, and more besides, and that he was through with the northern country. Whitney did not communicate the latter part of this statement to Commander Peary.

Continuing, Mr. Whitney said that Dr. Cook had complained to him of Peary's taking over his house and stores, but declared that he had suffered no unfairness. Peary's steward, William Pritchard, was present when these statements were made; like Mr. Whitney, he was pledged to secrecy by Dr. Cook. Murphy, Peary's boatswain, who was in charge of the stores, was absent at Etah on this day and did not hear Dr. Cook's communications.

There were two houses on the Greenland shore, one at Annotok, holding Cook's stores, and another at Etah, holding Peary's stores. The three white men, Whitney, Murphy and Pritchard, sometimes occupied one and sometimes the other of these houses. Murphy is not able to read or write. He had written instructions from Peary which Whitney, at Peary's request, read over to him from time to time. These instructions were very stringent. They directed Murphy to use Cook's stores first and Peary's afterwards.

Murphy was told in them that he was to give Dr. Cook every help if he came along in a needy condition, and furthermore the instruction implied that Murphy was to organize an expedition to search for Dr. Cook, but according to Mr. Whitney this part of the instructions was worded ambiguously. Mr. Whitney said that Cook had a copy of these instructions and would doubtless make them public.

When Dr. Cook and his Eskimos arrived at the house they had no sledge; being too tired to drag it over the rough ice they had left it 20 miles from Etah. The following day some other Eskimos went out, recovered the sledge and brought it in. On it were Dr. Cook's instruments, clothes and food.

After spending two days at Annotok, where Cook first met Whitney, Cook started for Etah. Whitney accompanied him.

The doctor had figured out roughly the date tht he would likely get to Upernavik, and when the Dundee whalers or the Danish store ships would reach there, and he argued that he had no time to lose. He planned originally to take two Eskimos and two sledges, but one Eskimo fell sick and this made it necessary for him to cut down the luggage he could take with him south.

New York.—Dr. Frederick A. Cook contemplates the bringing of a suit against Commander Peary to recover damages for slander and defamation, according to friends of the Brooklyn explorer.

Dr. Cook himself had nothing to say regarding the proposed suit, but his secretary, Walter Lonsdale, admitted Saturday that the idea was seriously entertained, both by Dr. Cook and by John R. Bradley, Cook's backer. He said that affidavits had already been prepared in case it was definitely decided to bring the suit."

TOTS NEAR DEATH IN FIRE

Although Hemmed In on Three Sides by Flames Children Are Rescued from Home.

Wheeling, W. Va. — The Country children's home at Tacoma, Belmont county, Ohio, was partially destroyed by fire and 15 children narrowly escaped death or serious injury. Although hemmed in on three sides by flames all were rescued by Miss Grace Green, a nurse, who succeeded in getting them through a window to safety. The loss is $15,000.

TAFT FAVORS SHIP SUBSIDY

COUNTRY NEEDS MORE VESSELS, SAYS THE PRESIDENT.

Wouldn't Have Enough in Case of War—Sees Miners Work in Montana.

Seattle, Wash.—President Taft, speaking before a vast concourse of people assembled in the natural amphitheater of the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific exposition, which has a seating capacity of nearly 20,000, Thursday, announced that he had concluded to urge upon congress, in his annual message, the passage of a ship subsidy bill.

Mr. Taft declared that the country was ready to make such experiment and that something must be done to build up an American merchant marine. His utterances on this subject were received with great acclaim. He said that if a war should come at this time, the United States would not have enough vessels to carry coal to its fleets. And it would be doubtful, under neutrality laws, he added, if the United States would be able to buy foreign vessels in the emergency.

Tacoma, Wash., Oct. 2.—After passing two days in and about Seattle President Taft came to Tacoma and received from the audience that thronged the big armory one of the most cordial greetings of his trip. The president was entertained at dinner at the Union club, after making the trip from Seattle on board the yacht Elprimero, owned by Chester Thorne. The torpedo boat destroyer Perry escorted the yacht.

From the exposition grounds the president motored to the Seattle Country club, where he took luncheon and passed the early afternoon on the golf links. The sail on the sound from Seattle to Tacoma occupied two hours.

President Taft promised to attend another exposition to be held on the Pacific coast in 1915 in celebration of the completion of the Panama canal. Mr. Taft said the date was beyond his term of office but that his interest in the Panama canal and in the extension of trade on the Pacific had been so great for so many years that he readily gave his promise to attend.

President Taft's unqualified statement in his speeches here that the Panama canal would be completed in 1915 aroused great enthusiasm, as the entire Pacific coast is expecting to profit greatly by the short all-water route from the eastern seaboard and the opening of European markets to this section.

TEST FOR CENSUS AGENTS

Director Durand Announces That Applicants for Appointment Will Be Examined November 3.

Washington.—Census Director E. Dana Durand announces November 3 next as the date for making a practical test of the qualifications of applicants for appointment as special agents for the collection of the thirteenth census statistics of manufactures, mines and quarries. Blank applications may be obtained now by writing the bureau of the census. No applications which are received after the close of business October 25 will be considered.

In a circular of instructions relative to the subject, approved by Secretary Nagel of the department of commerce and labor, the director states that about January 1, 1910, the bureau will employ from 1,600 to 1,800 special agents.

HEADS TOLEDO UNIVERSITY

Prof. J. H. Raymond, President of Municipally Owned Institution in the Ohio City.

Toledo, O.—Prof. Jerome H. Raymond, for some years connected with the university, Friday assumed the presidency of the Toledo university, which is owned and operated by the city of Toledo. Mrs. Raymond, who has been a lecturer in literature in the extension department of the Chicago institution, will create a similar department here. Prof. Raymond is an authority on sociology. He first became connected with the University of Chicago in 1894, later was a member of the faculties of the universities of Wisconsin and West Virginia, and went back to Chicago in 1901.

Ann Arbor, Mich.—Prof. Harry B. Hutchins began his duties as acting president of the University of Michigan, this being the date when the resignation of President James B. Angell became effective.

Strike-Breakers Fire on Pickets.

Elwood, Ind. — The first marked violence of the strike at the American Sheet & Tinplate mills in this city occurred when two foreign strike-breakers, who were leaving the mills at the midnight shift, opened fire on a number of strikers' pickets and, when policemen interfered, fired at the officers. All the bullets went wild. One strike-breaker was arrested.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam' Minn. under th Act of Congress of March 3, 1879

R. J. Montague has tendered his reignation as Register of the U.S. Land office at Crookston to take affect in December Aurthur Toupin, of Red Lake Falis has been indorsed by Congressman Steenerson as his successor. The appointment of Mr. Toupin for this important position will be a good one, as he is well qalified for the position, and understands the situation of the homesteader of northern Minnesota.

Congressman Steenerson is to make a special trip to Washinton to appear before the war department to get some needed improvements on Red Lake River. If he succeed the improvements will be made next year but if there can be nothing done to let the water out of the lake into the river so we can run the boats on it, we would rather see it taken out from under the control of the war department, so the people could build brdges accross it without haveing to get a string of red tape half a mile long from the government.

Good Representatives, To Leave At Home.

We are in receipt of a letter from representative J. J. Opsahl under date of September 2nd, in which he says. "The Drainage Commission with its Engineer, and the Emigration Commission left here last Friday for a trip around Red Lake and we expected to have gone down through the Red Lake River as far as Sunbeam on Sunday, but on reaching the outlet found that the Government boat which we had was unable to cross the sand bar compelling us to give it up. I am sure the state Department will do what they can toward a proper devellopment of the Red Lake River and createing storage resivor at the outlet on the two lakes, to relieve the situation from Highlanding east between Red Lake and Clearwater River, the channel will need to be dredged from some point near Highlanding to the Lake and lower level maintained on the lakes."

It will be seen by the above that our representative, from this District in the last legilature is taking quite an active interest in the improvement of Red Lake River, but of course he will forget all about it should he be elected a member of the next legislature. Opsahl end Hanson are two of the best representatives that this district ever had, when the legislature is not in session, but when it is they seem to be bewilderd and act like a young colt the first time it gets out on the public high way, that begins to whinny and run, and will follow any team off, wheather they ever see them before, or not.

Such men are a positive dammage to any district in northern Minnesota that they are elected to represent, and it would be better to have the legislative chairs of this district stand empty than to have them filled by men that are only looking for a "pork barrel" and a county option law. As long as we elect men of this kind to the legislature we can not expect to get even an empty pork barrel or a county option law, for they are simply 0 among an entelligent body of men.

HUNTING ROCK HARES.

A Fleet Little Animal Found Among the Sand Hills of Arabia.

How long the Arab has inhabited the deserts of the near east is a much discussed question. How long he has indulged in the old time sport of falconry it is equally difficult to say. Sure it is that this keen blooded race has not lived all these centuries in those sun scorched wastes without some sort of recreation, and his delights today are probably much the same as those of his ancestors a couple of thousand years ago.

Curious to see what natural sport these barren regions could afford, the writer accepted an invitation to join a party of Syrian Arabs for a week's hunting. Our quarry was the rock hare, an animal about the size of an English rabbit, but with very fine developed ears, which frequents these deserts in small numbers, living on what scanty herbage it can find.

We started straight away in search of it by forming a chain about a quarter of a mile long and drawing likely tracts of desert in long semicircular sweeps. The herbage was very scant indeed. These sand hills, being scorched by a tropical sun and having a yearly rainfall of only some three inches, support but few plants of any kind. I noticed a few insectivorous birds pursuing their prey with keen voracity, as though they found it hard to make a living, but saw no trace of wild animals.

On we marched in silent order, merely following the lead of our falcon bearer, whose face seemed invariable, his manner unmoved. Hours passed by. It was now 11 o'clock. The sun was hot above us, drying up our parched lips. I began to think that rock hares must be a myth when suddenly the hound leaped forward with a great bound, our horses instinctively following at full gallop. But we had not far to go. It was only a "garbour." The hound was soon up to it, and I thought it was all over; but, no—the little creature leaped, as it were, right out of his mouth.

One spring brought the greyhound alongside again, but again this agile quadruped had slipped out of the grasp of his sharp teeth. The speed of the tiny thing was so great and its actions so sudden that it was as much as the eye could do to follow it at all. Again its great pursuer sprang upon it; again this nimble animal slipped from his very jaws. But it was no good. It was outclassed in size. These great leaps shook the very life breath from its frail body.

At last it fell an easy prey to its relentless enemy, and one crunch put an end to its miseries. It was an interesting little beast, its body about the size of a rat. It carried a fine long coat, was gray on the back, with white under the belly, having a long bony tail with a pretty tuft at the end. But its hind legs were its great feature. They were very long, being, like those of the kangaroo, specially adapted for jumping. I noted, too, that each hind foot was provided with only three toes, whereas on those of the fore legs, which were very short, there were the normal five. Altogether it was a most interesting and sporting specimen.—"Near East."

Descendants of David.

The history of the Sassoons is one of the most dramatic in the very dramatic story of the Hebrew race. The original Sassoon was a Bombay merchant, but the family is descended from a group known as Ibn Shoshan, who at one time held the position of nossi of Toledo. The name Shoshan, which signifies "lily" in Hebrew, was gradually transformed into Sassoon, signifying "gladness." The family claim Davidic descent, and Abraham Sassoon, who flourished in the seventeenth century, stated that he was a direct descendant of Shephatiah, the fifth son of David. Not only are there many references to the name in Hebrew mediaeval literature, but mention of it is made in the Talmud.—London M. A. P.

Kissing the Book.

In England and all the English speaking countries the kissing of the book before the oath comes from the practice of touching a "halidame," or sacred object, as the old Roman touched the altar of Harold the casket of relics. The form "So help me God" is inherited from ancient Teutonic-Scandinavian law, under which the old northmen, touching the blood daubed ring on the altar, swore, "So help me Frey and Niordh and the Almighty God"—that is, Thor. The first and last of these are the two old English gods, whose names we keep up in Friday and Thursday.—New York American.

ABSENTMINDED.

The Dinner to Which Wills, the Artist, Invited a Friend.

Mr. Wills, the artist, was renowned for his absentmindedness, and the following story, says Henrietta Cockran in her book, "Celebrities and I," was told of him by a friend: "Wills invited me to dinner one afternoon when I met him in the Strand. I accepted, reminding him that as he was absentminded he had better make a note of the evening. As he had no paper in his pocket, he wrote the date on his shirt cuff.

"When the appointed evening arrived I went to his studio. The door was opened by Wills, and I could see that he had forgotten all about the appointment.

"'Ah, old fellow,' he exclaimed, 'do not be too hard on me. The cuff went to the wash and the date with it. But there is a fowl in the pot boiling here,' continued Mr. Wills. 'Just come in and wait a few minutes.'

"I had my misgivings, but walked inside and sat upon the only chair not crowded with paint brushes and palettes.

"After waiting for about twenty minutes, feeling deucedly hungry, I groaned. This had its effect.

"He exclaimed in a dreamy voice, 'The fowl must be boiled by this time,' and, coming forward, he lifted the lid of the pot and peered inside. 'It is very odd,' he remarked, 'but I cannot see the fowl. Extraordinary! No one has been here, so the bird cannot have been stolen.'

"Well, the long and short of it is that a week or two later I called again at the studio, noticed a peculiar odor and discovered the fowl wrapped up in a piece of paper.

"'Ah!' said Wills. 'Now I know how it all happened. When the fowl was brought in there came a smart visitor—Lady G.—about sitting for her portrait. I must have thrown the fowl behind a canvas and forgotten about it.'"

True merriment may be distinguished from false by the fact that it bears reflection. We can think of it with pleasure next day and next week.

MARINERS' COMPASS.

Little Known of the Real Origin of the Instrument.

ITS USE BY THE CHINESE.

This Wonderful People Knew of the Magnetic Needle Long Before the Christian Era—The Claims of Gioia, the Pilot, and the Credit Due Him.

Much interest must forever attach to the discovery of that valuable instrument, the mariner's compass, and yet there are few subjects concerning which less is known. For a period the honor of the invention was ascribed to Gioia, a pilot, born at Pasitano, a small village situated near Amalfi, about the end of the thirteenth century. His claims, however, have been disputed.

Much learning and labor have been bestowed upon the subject of the discovery. It has been maintained by one class that even the Phoenicians were the inventors, by another that the Greeks and Romans had a knowledge of it. Such notions, however, have been completely refuted.

One passage, nevertheless, of a remarkable character occurs in the works of Cardinal de Vitty, bishop of Ptolemais, in Syria. He went to Palestine during the fourth crusade, about the year 1204. He returned afterward to Europe and subsequently back to the Holy Land, where he wrote his work entitled "Historia Orientalis," as nearly as can be determined, between the years 1215 and 1220. In chapter 91 of that work he has this singular passage:

"The iron needle, after contact with the loadstone, constantly turns to the north star, which, at the axis of the firmament, remains immovable while the others revolve, and hence it is essentially necessary to those navigating on the ocean."

These words are as explicit as they are extraordinary. They state a fact and announce a use. The thing, therefore, which essentially constitutes the compass must have been known long before the birth of Gioia. In addition to this fact, there is another equally fatal to his claim as the original discoverer.

It is now settled beyond a doubt that the Chinese were acquainted with the compass long before the Europeans. It is certain that there are allusions to the magnetic needle in the traditionary period of Chinese history, about 2,000 years before Christ, and a still more credible account of it is found in the reign of Chingwang of the Chow dynasty, before Christ 1114.

All this, however, may be granted without in the least impairing the just claims of Gioia to the gratitude of mankind. The truth appears to be that the position of Gioia in relation to the compass was precisely that of Watt in relation to the steam engine—the element existed; he augmented its utility.

The compass used by the mariners in the Mediterranean during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries was a very uncertain and unsatisfactory apparatus. It consisted only of a magnetic needle floating in a vase or basin by means of two straws on a bit of cork supporting it on the surface of the water.

The compass used by the Arabians in the thirteenth century was an instrument of exactly the same description. Now, the inconvenience and inefficiency of such an apparatus are obvious. The agitation of the ocean and the tossing of the vessel might render it useless in a moment.

But Gioia placed the magnetized needle on a pivot, which permits it to turn to all sides with facility. Afterward it was attached to a card divided into thirty-two points, called rose de vents, and then the box containing it was suspended in such a manner that, however the vessel might be tossed, it would always remain horizontal.—Electrical Engineer.

Stung.

The old gentleman went into the parlor the other night at the witching hour of 10:30 and found the lights out and his daughter and a dear friend enjoying a tete-a-tete in a corner by the window.

"Evangeline," said the old man sternly, "this is scandalous!"

"Yes, papa," she answered sweetly. "It is candleless because times are hard. Lights cost so much Ferdinand and I said we would get along with the starlight."

And papa turned about in speechless amazement and tried to walk out of the room through a panel in the wall paper.—Exchange.

The Difference.

"Father," said little Rollo, "what is the difference between farming and agriculture?"

"Well, my son, for farming you need a plow and a harrow and a lot of other implements, and for agriculture all you need is a pencil and a piece of paper."—Washington Star.

The Mess In the Oven.

"How came such a greasy mess in the oven?" said a fidgety old spinster to her maid of all work.

"Why," replied the girl, "the candles fell into the water, and I put them into the oven to dry."—London Tatler.

German Dialect In Wisconsin.

It is two German women who are speaking in the presence of an Irish woman.

"Th' tap o' th' mornin' t' ye, Mis' Brettschneider. 'Tis glad I am t' see th' likes av ye. Iss yet daughther Gretchen goin t' the Hill th' morrow?"

"Faith an' she is. Ven me bye Heinrich can get th' bay hourse away from th' plowin'. I t'ink I'll go mesilf, be dad."

This is not travesty. It is a report of German dialect. The manner of speech came about naturally enough. When the Germans arrived here in full force the country was already settled, largely by Yankees and Irish, and the German had to buy his farm here or there. Thus a number of them found themselves located in the town of Erin, where, of course, they learned the language of the country. And I leave it to my fellow citizens in Wisconsin whether a German cannot speak as broad and rich a brogue as any son of Erin.—Charles D. Stewart in Atlantic

Bolivia.

Bolivia is famous for its silver, but also possesses considerable quantities of gold, which, however, cannot be extracted without great expense. In the seventeenth century an Indian near the town of La Paz found a mass of native gold, supposed to have been detached from the neighboring mountain by lightning. Bolivia is, on the whole, in a backward condition; political changes and internal conflicts having hindered the development of its natural wealth.

When Man Was a Marine Animal.

It was M. Quinton, a French physiologist, who several years ago wrote a paper to show that the colorless fluid in which the red corpuscles of our blood float and which is called the "blood serum" is the same fluid as that which constituted the primeval sea. The earliest forms of life which floated in the primeval sea were such that the cells and tissues of which they were constituted were always bathed by this primeval fluid. When silica became a constituent of the sea these animals may have coated themselves with silicious coverings, but many of their cells were still bathed by the fluid, and some of them as they passed from the sea to the land may have closed up their alimentary canals, so that a distinction arose between their internal organs and their outer superficies, but still, for the good of their cells, they still bathed them in the saline fluid. To do so more effectively they took the saline fluid ashore with them in the form of a blood serum, and it is this blood serum which we carry about with us today, the most evident relic of the age when we were marine animals.

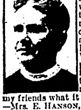
HER PHYSICIAN ADVISED

Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound



Columbus, Ohio.—"I have taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound during change of life. My doctor told me it was good, and since taking it I feel so much better that I can do all my work again. I think Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a fine remedy for all woman's troubles, and I never forget to tell my friends what it has done for me."—Mrs. E. Hanson, 304 East Long St., Columbus, Ohio.

Another Woman Helped.

Graniteville, Vt.—"I was passing through the Change of Life and suffered from nervousness and other annoying symptoms. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound restored my health and strength, and proved worth mountains of gold to me. For the sake of other suffering women I am willing you should publish my letter."—Mrs. Charles Barclay, R.F.D., Graniteville, Vt.

Women who are passing through this critical period or who are suffering from any of those distressing ills peculiar to their sex should not lose sight of the fact that for thirty years Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, which is made from roots and herbs, has been the standard remedy for female ills. In almost every community you will find women who have been restored to health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

THOS. LAWSON'S TRIBUTE TO
JNO. A. JOHNSON

Thomas W. Lawson was an intimate friend of Governor Johnson. Upon hearing of his death, he wired the following, which is one of the finest things that has been said of the dead governor.

"Yesterday and yesterdays when the sun's red-brown halo blended my hollyhocks and sunflowers to nodding evening gods, he used to loom, a soulful, heart-loving inspiration. From my garden's twilight quiet I have often visioned him, this tall, swaying pine of the west, and the visioning peopled my world with times and things and men long, long since dead and dust, and these times and things and men glowed the heart and soothed the soul and charitied the mind and made for love of good and for shame of petty meaness and sordid hatred.

"When I say this I limn the man. No human ever entered the atmosphere of John Johnson without being better. He was indeed a man, a made-in-the-image-of-his-God man. Wives looked upon his wife and blessed him; mothers gazed upon his mother and prayed their sons might be in his mold; and the children and the dogs and the flowers and God's good earth beamed and laughed and warmed when his presence came.

Such a Good Man.

"Ah! But he was such a man, such a good man. I saw him on the field, in the tent, and in the orchards, where the great, ripe juicy golden plums of man-wealth hung low and vainly screamed for plucking, and I sat with him by the hour in his office of state while his mind romped in freedom and his long legs crossed and uncrossed themselves over the corner of the desk upon which the freemen of a great western empire laid honor-offering.

"I have ridden with him the hot days through, in the dusty, nerve racking railroad train, and I've been with him when he listened to the fealty message of the leaders of his party which cooed about that crown and throne which is the dream of all red-blooded Americans; and I've brought him the taunt of his great rival, and yet in all I never once saw that childish merry twinkle leave those wonderfully love-begetting eyes, and I never heard a discord in that voice of trust and faith and charity and good will to all. Ah! But he was such a man, such a good man.

"John Johnson's vision was all outward. He had no mirror, and had he one he would have held it to reflect the beauties and the goodness of his fellows.

Story of a Boy.

"The other evening Erman Ridgeway, his good wife, and myself were in the bus with this great man on our way to hear him lecture. We'd had a jolly good dinner and he was snuggled into the corner muffled in his big fur coat, and we thought he wanted to be alone to tell over his great speech, when, as he neared the church where his lecture was to be delivered, he said, "I'm nervous tonight, Lawson, for I'm going to make my lecture the simple story of how I pardoned a boy and gave him back to his old mother and father. I want you to hear it, but I know I'll cry and make a country booby of myself, and then these eastern people will wonder what my great state was thinking of in electing such a governor."

"'Twas a big audience, big in intelligence, big in sympathy with this latterday Abe Lincoln of the people; and Governor Johnson told his story and the tears trickled down his cheeks and his gentle voice was gentler than its wont, but we, his audience—yes, all of us—men, women and children, we cried, just laid back and let 'er go in one of those heart-relieving, don't-give-a-picayune-who-sees-us sobbing outbursts, and at the close of the story I said to the big, strong mannish governor of New Jersey, who had sat with bowed head as John Johnson, the man, told the simple story of how Governor Johnson, of the great state of Minnesota gave their boy back to the old father and mother, 'Governor, I notice that you, too, forgot that Governor Johnson was of the enemy.'

"Yes, yes, I forgot everything but the story and the man who was telling it,' and he tried to sneak away the trail the story had left on his cheek, 'and if all democrats were like Governor Johnson there'd be no enemies."

Runs Race Joyfully.

"God was good to John Johnson. He endowed him with all those riches which make for happiness here and hereafter. Birthed from the womb of the common people, cradled in that greatest of all world luxuries, poverty, he came to the starting line a moral Hercules, bursting with love of mother and adoration of wife, bristling with affection for humanity and charity and forgiveness for his enemies, and muscled with a superb honesty and veneration for God and nature. The starter's bell was to him a joyful 'go.' As he ran he saw no mire, no boulders, no ditches, only God's great blue; he felt only God's warming sun-rays and as he ran for Them, not himself, 'tis no wonder that his track was fast and his feet winged.

"God was good to Governor Johnson. He took him as he took the sainted Lincoln and all his very chosen, while yet they ran, while yet their fellows cheered, while yet their souls were radiant with the intoxication of ambition's rays.

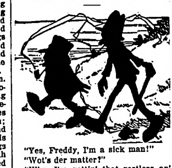
"To us who were blessed with the privilege of his presence is left the consolation that he was, and is yet. Let us rain our tears, but not for him. Let us weep for her whose sun is set and for the nation which so sorely needs her valiant sons and for humanity whose champion has gone over yonder. For myself, my sadness is mellowed by the thought that I knew him, and by the faith that his shadow will for ages be a dream-cradle for countless despairing souls. Ah! But he was such a man, such a good man."

Feeding Farm Hands.

Every farmer's wife knows what tremendous appetites farm hands usually have; but while they eat well they work well, too.

Here's a good suggestion about feeding farm hands. Give them plenty of Quaker Oats. A big dish of Quaker Oats porridge with sugar and cream or milk is the greatest breakfast in the world for a man who needs vigor and strength for a long day's work. The man that eats Quaker Oats plentifully and often is the man who does good work without excessive fatigue. There is a sustaining quality in Quaker Oats not found in other foods, and for economy it is at the head of the list. Besides the regular size packages Quaker Oats is packed in large size family packages, with and without china. 5

THE DANGER SIGNAL



"Yes, Freddy, I'm a sick man!"

"Wot's der matter?"

"Why, I'm gettin' that restless an' wakeful, dat I can't sleep, only at night!"

Would Find Use for It.

After a day and a night spent in answering telephone calls from people who wanted the latest news from Peary and Dr. Cook, the secretary of one of the arctic clubs had retired for a well-earned rest, when the persistent 'phone bell rang again. A voice at the other end said:

"Do you want the ambulance sent right over?"

"What ambulance?" roared the irate secretary.

"Why, the one you sent for."

"I sent for no ambulance."

"You lie!"

The secretary gasped, then he screamed into the 'phone:

"Send it as soon as possible, and you come over, too, and I'll send you back in it!"

Poker Finance.

Mose Coonley (a winner)—Guess I'll cash in, boys.

Ours and Theirs.

"A play on names unconsciously perpetrated by my youngest son was very funny," said a Flatbush man the other day. "We live next door to a family named Feitenour, and the other night while my family was busy reading in the library we heard a racket on the back porch. My son went out to investigate, and on his return my wife, always inquisitive, asked what had caused the noise.

"'Nothin' but a couple of cats,' Jim told her, and then I heard her ask: 'Did you see whose they were?'

"'Yes; one was ours and the other was Feitenour's.'"

Mail Bags Spread Tuberculosis.

Letters and mail bags are carriers of tuberculosis. According to testimony recently given before the postal commission of the British empire, during the last 20 years 80 per cent. of the deaths among letter sorters had been due to consumption, contracted by the men after they had entered the service.

CHILDREN SHOWED IT
Effect of Their Warm Drink in the Morning.

A year ago I was a wreck from coffee drinking and was on the point of giving up my position in the school room because of nervousness.

"I was telling a friend about it and she said, 'We drink nothing at meal time but Postum, and it is such a comfort to have something we can enjoy drinking with the children.'

"I was astonished that she would allow the children to drink any kind of coffee, but she said Postum was the most healthful drink in the world for children as well as for older ones, and that the condition of both the children and adults showed that to be a fact.

"My first trial was a failure. The cook boiled it four or five minutes and it tasted so flat that I was in despair but determined to give it one more trial. This time we followed the directions and boiled it fifteen minutes after the boiling began. It was a decided success and I was completely won by its rich delicious flavour. In a short time I noticed a decided improvement in my condition and kept growing better month after month, until now I am perfectly healthy, and do my work in the school room with ease and pleasure. I would not return to the nerve-destroying regular coffee for any money."

A NURSE'S EXPERIENCE.
Backache, Pains in the Kidneys, Bloating, Etc., Overcome.

A nurse is expected to know what to do for common ailments, and women who suffer backache, constant languor, and other common symptoms of kidney complaint, should be grateful to Mrs. Minnie Turner, of E. B. St., Anadarko, Okla., for pointing out the way to find quick relief. Mrs. Turner used Doan's Kidney Pills for a run-down condition, backache, pains in the sides and kidneys, bloated limbs, etc. "The way they have built me up is simply marvelous," says Mrs. Turner, who is a nurse. "My health improved rapidly. Five boxes did so much for me I am telling everybody about it."

WHERE THEY LEARN ECONOMY
Matron Knew What She Was About When She Went to Engage Maid.

The manager of the employment agency was used to hearing women in search of maids ask applicants all sorts of queer questions, says the New York Tribune, but this matron made him mildly curious. Of 14 girls in turn she had inquired: "Have you worked in a minister's family?" None of them had. "Too bad," said the matron to the manager. "None of these girls will do."

"May I ask," said the manager, "why you are anxious to know if these girls have worked in ministers' families?"

"Why, the fact is, we're very hard up just now," said the matron, candidly; "I want a girl who knows how to economize, and those who have worked in clergymen's families, I've discovered, have learned that lesson."

CHILD ATE CUTICURA OINTMENT.
Spread Whole Box of It on Crackers—Not the Least Injury Resulted.
Cuticura Thus Proven Pure and Sweet.

A New York friend of Cuticura writes:

"My three year old son and heir, after being put to bed on a trip across the Atlantic, investigated the stateroom and located a box of graham crackers and a box of Cuticura Ointment. When a search was made for the box, it was found empty and the kid admitted that he had eaten the contents of the entire box spread on the crackers. It cured him of a bad cold and I don't know what else."

No more conclusive evidence could be offered that every ingredient of Cuticura Ointment is absolutely pure, sweet and harmless. If it may be safely eaten by a young child, none but the most beneficial results can be expected to attend its application to even the tenderest skin or youngest infant.

Beware of Ointments for Catarrh that Contain Mercury, as mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. On a Time Limitation.

In spite of the reputation for latitudinarianism he gained from his early trial for heresy, the late Prof. Jowett of Oxford was intolerant of pretentiousness and shallow conceit. One self-satisfied undergraduate met the master one day. "Master," he said, "I have searched everywhere in all philosophies, ancient and modern, and nowhere do I find the evidence of a God." "Mr. ——," replied the master, after a shorter pause than usual, "if you don't find a God by five o'clock this afternoon you must leave this college."

The Way of It.

"But I don't love you," objected the young woman.

"Then why," howled the indignant youth, referring hastily to divers memoranda in his pocket diary, "did you eat up a total of 65 boxes of chocolates I bought you during the past year if you didn't love me?"

"Because," she said, with a rapt expression on her lovely features, "I do love chocolate."

Afraid of Ghosts

Many people are afraid of ghosts. Few people are afraid of germs. Yet the ghost is a fancy and the germ is a fact. If the germ could be magnified to a size equal to its terrors it would appear more terrible than any fire-breathing dragon. Germs can't be avoided. They are in the air we breathe, the water we drink.

The germ can only prosper when the condition of the system gives it free scope to establish itself and develop. When there is a deficiency of vital force, languor, restlessness, a sallow cheek, a hollow eye, when the appetite is poor and the sleep is broken, it is time to guard against the germ. You can fortify the body against all germs by the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It increases the vital power, cleanses the system of clogging impurities, enriches the blood, puts the stomach and organs of digestion and nutrition in working condition, so that the germ finds no weak or tainted spot in which to breed. "Golden Medical Discovery" contains no alcohol, whisky or habit-forming drugs. All its ingredients printed on its outside wrapper. It is not a secret nostrum but a medicine OF KNOWN COMPOSITION and with a record of 40 years of cures. Accept no substitute—there is nothing "just as good." Ask your neighbors.

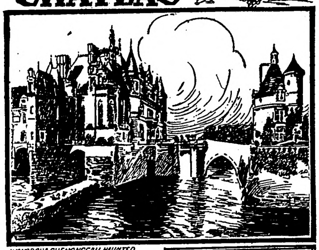
ROYAL GHOSTS HAUNT FRENCH CHATEAU



WONDROUS CHENONCEAU HAUNTED CHATEAU

WOULD you give millions for a chateau besieged by royal ghosts, vainly haunting the scenes of their old loves and crimes?

The ghosts are dread French kings, from Francis I. to Charles IX., with beautiful but cruel Diane de Poitiers and Catherine de Medici, the terrible queen-mother. Even the unhappy Mary Stuart knew the lovely scene.

The scene is outside wondrous Chenonceau, said to be again for sale—unless already sold—in the division of the Terry estate.

If you can pay the millions, take the ghosts as an extra attraction. They cannot harm plain Americans. Here is a mystery. The ghosts cannot enter the chateau so long as plain, untitled folks live in it. The potent influence of its builder—an untitled business woman of the renaissance—will keep the royal robbers out in the park!

Go back a century. Claude Dupin, plain tax-farmer, purchased Chenonceau in great dilapidation for 300,000 francs in 1733 and spent 100,000 francs in restorations. Here the Dupins held a brilliant literary court, with Buffon, Voltaire and Rousseau; and the chateau went peacefully to their descendants from whom Wilson's daughter bought it.

For the strong business woman of old days, who built the unique palace: Catherine Briconnet descended from a small shopkeeper's family of Tours, fostered to greatness like so many other "little people"—Barthelots, Pouchers Bohiers—by democratic Louis XI. Behold Catherine Briconnet, daughter of a banker who died archbishop, married to Thomas Bohier, a farmer general, and rich enough to buy the marques' fief.

While Thomas financed the armies of two kings Catherine left at home, built Chenonceau.

Catherine's husband, Bohier, died in the rout of the French army in Italy. Catherine died a year later. Francis I., finding his treasury emptied by Italian wars, brought suit against all the crown's financiers. The object was not to judge, but to grind money.

In five years the rich family of Bohier was ruined and Catherine's son, Antoine, was glad to humbly offer Francis I. his chateau of Chenonceau at a valuation of 90,000 livres as a quit claim. (It had cost his father 60,000 livres, or $120,000 in our money. Some 40,000 livres remained of the king's claim. The Bohiers were sucked dry.

Francis visited Chenonceau twice, an ill, melancholy man, and died a nasty death. But Diane de Poitiers had seen and liked the chateau of the waters.

Diane de Poitiers, celebrated in French history for her beauty, grace, crookedness, wickedness and unlimited influence over King Henri II., was married at 15 years to the hunchbacked Louis de Brezy, grand seneschal of Normandy, who was 60. Two years later her father, implicated in a plot, was being led off to the Place de Greve, Paris, to have his head cut off, but youthful Diane was talking with the dauphin. The father was reprieved at the last moment, and Diane became a political figure.

On the death of Francis I., her first act was to have the dauphin become king, dispossess her old rival, Duchess d'Etampes, of all her property. Finally, by letters patent, Diane obtained "our chateau of Chenonceau."

Here is one of the crimes of Chenonceau. A young gentleman, La Chateigneraie, knew too much about Diane. Another De Jarnac, married the sister of her old rival, Duchess d'Etampes.

"Ask De Jarnac how he dresses so well?" said Diane to La Chateigneraie.

LA CHATEIGNERAIE KISSING DIANE DE POITIERS

"My mother-in-law helps me out," explained the unsuspecting De Jarnac. On which Diane caused the hateful whisper to go round:

"Do you know what La Chateigncraie says about De Jarnac and his mother-in-law?"

They fought with swords and daggers in the presence of the court. Like Iago. "Which one kills the other, I care nothing," thought Diane; but she felt safer when, to everybody's surprise, De Jarnac suddenly seemed to slip, fell to one knee, and hamstrung his superior adversary with a back pull of his sword. La Chateigneraie bled to death. To-day a "coup De Jarnac" means almost a foul; but the maneuver was perfectly regular, if new.

Here is another crime of Chenonceau. Diane, having finished the bridge-wing at a cost of 9,000 livres ($18,000 to-day), built Italian gardens in the style of Passelo de Mercogliano. The archbishop of Tours lent her a remarkable young gardener, Nicquet, to train up her fruit walks. Nicquet was handsome, distinguished, seductive, innocent; the court was at Blois; there was a passing escapade of a summer's afternoon or two; and then the handsome young gardener died of alleged cholera.

Of all Diane's crimes, this one stuck most. The victim was a servant; and the vengeful clan whispered the tale to their masters far and wide. Later, when Henri II. lay dying it became the pretext on which Tavannes offered the queen to go and cut off Diane's nose. Instead, the philosophical Catherine De Medicis offered to spare the fallen beauty's mutilation—on condition that Diane should give her Chenonceau.

Catherine de Medici got Diane's clear title to Chenonceau by the ostensible trade of mortgaged Chaumont. (An American woman, Esther Alexander, legal French wife of Robert de Broglie, is, with him, co-heir-apparent to the latter historic chateau at this moment.)

Her first great fete at Chenonceau was a triumphal entry for the new king, her son, Francis II. and his young wife, Mary Stuart. Arches, obelisks, columns, statues, fountains, antique altars, fireworks, music and 300 cannons made a wonderful effect. These were the happiest days of Mary Stuart.

A dowager duchess of Vendome dying without children in 1718—"killed," says Saint-Simon, "by abuse of strong liquors"—long abandoned and neglected Chenonceau passed by inheritances to the Prince de Conde, who sold it to the plain, untitled business man, Dupin.

A business man, an untitled middle-class man, at last again owned the fairy chateau of the water for which kings, queens and favorites committed crimes.

The ghosts of Chenonceau fled the interior.

Voltaire, visiting Dupin, saw Diane de Poitiers kissed by La Chateigneraie in armor, in a thicket by the river.

Grevy, president of the republic, visiting the sister of his son-in-law sat in the park at midnight watching. He beheld a rabble of pale shades besieging the chateau. They could not enter.

Washington Wants Next Aero Carnival

FLY A LITTLE

WASHINGTON.—One of the hopes expressed by the Washington Aero club for having the next aviation carnival here is an appropriation by congress to help swell the guarantee fund. It was stated by Charles J. Bell, one of the Washington representatives at the Curtiss luncheon, that Dr. Zahm, secretary of the Aero club, and a member of the special committee on securing the meet for Washington, had asked the co-operation of Norfolk in the matter. J. A. Hall, the secretary of the Norfolk board of trade, said he had not yet received such notification, but that as soon as the matter was placed before them the Norfolk business men were prepared to act.

Norfolk, Portsmouth, Newport News and Old Point are all much interested in seeing the meet come to Washington, owing to the prospect of a water flight to Norfolk. There is a great deal of money in that section, and the local men say they are willing to contribute largely to secure the carnival. In the meantime, Baltimore is very active and promises to work unremittingly for the meet.

"As a matter of fact," Mayor Mahool says, "we have only begun, and while the prospect is now rosy, we must keep moving and not only retain our present advantage over other cities, but increase it. To get the meet we must go after it, and keep after it, and our labors to date will be lost if we permit our ardor to flag.

"From the sentiment generally expressed by members of the club in New York, I am profoundly encouraged and hopeful. Each man appeared to be impressed with the energy and sincerity of Baltimore and to appreciate that we are thoroughly in earnest in our demand for the meet. Of course, none was prepared actually to commit himself in favor of any particular city, especially members of the executive committee, and I can readily understand their reluctance to take a positive position at this point, but all gave us the utmost encouragement, and eevn intimated that they would work for Baltimore and Washington."

Similar reports were made by others of the party, and the feeling prevailed that a vast amount of good had been accomplished by the visit to Gotham.

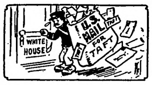
Still further evidence of the rapid growth of interest in Baltimore in aviation has also been demonstrated in the arrangement of long-distance balloon trips from Baltimore, and Mr. Hillery Beachey is preparing flights for enthusiasts in this section. Mr. Beachey's first trip of the kind, made several days ago, was an unqualified success, and balloon flights are expected to become almost as popular as trolley rides or automobile jaunts.

It is understood that a resolution will be introduced in the council asking for an appropriation to help swell the fund to advertise Baltimore, and while the city has no power to so appropriate money, if the council pass favorably upon the measure an enabling act will be introduced in the legislature giving the city the power.

As to the congressional appropriation, it is said by members of the Aero club that, aside from the desirability of getting the financial help from congress, such action on the part of the government would give the meet an official standing in the view of foreigners which it would not otherwise have.

It is planned to have the carnival in Washington while congress is in session, and the members of the national legislature are not slow at voting themselves a treat when there is a reasonable chance to do so.

Toil at Capital Even if Taft Is Away



THERE is work in Washington even when the foreman of the shop is away. It seems almost unbelievable, but there are men and women in the United States who do not know that the president is absent from the capital. The list of persons who write letters to the chief executive firm in the conviction that he is still at his White House desk, might be of service to the circulating department of some live newspaper. There is a sad need in some parts of the country of a daily intelligencer.

Reports from the road go to show that Mr. Taft gets a daily mail en route and that in between speeches he does his best to give it attention. There is no great decrease evident, however, in the size of the mail that comes several times a day to the White House in this time of the president's absence. Mr. Taft's private secretary, Frederick W. Carpenter, is not taking a vacation. He is hard at work, and with his chief at a distance he has to decide certain problems which would not come before him for solution were the president at his desk. The entire clerical force at the White House is busy, and the only places where the hum of industry is unheard are in the cabinet room and in the president's private office.

There are those who do not regard the absence of the members of the official family as a wholly unmixed evil. The first assistant secretaries of the different departments act as chiefs in the absence of their superiors in office, and it is something even to a man to whom vanity is a thing apart to be able to write himself down in truth as acting secretary of the treasury, or of war or of the navy.

This year in the capital it certainly is a case of when the cat's away the mice will work. There is more activity manifest among the clerks of the different departments than ever before.

When the clerks first heard this announcement they smiled as they always had smiled when they heard the same announcement made in the years gone by. The time for smiling passed quickly, and it was the frown of the secretary of labor that sent the smile into hiding. Mr. Nagel was known when he came to Washington as a great politician. Politicians, as a rule are not given to such deeds as the disturbing of the equanimity of employes of the government. In truth politicians are regarded as being more or less easy. Mr. Nagel frowned.

Reads All of Congressman's Speeches

JAMES R. MANN, representative from the Second district of Chicago, who has been promoted to succeed William P. Hepburn of Iowa as chairman of the house committee on interstate and foreign commerce, probably gets his name in the Congressional Record more than any other member of that body. Mr. Mann's frequent appearance in the limelight is not the result of any desire on his part to play to the gallery, but is the natural consequence of his intent study of all pending legislation before congress.

Two years ago Mr. Mann went to the West Indies with Speaker Cannon, Vice-President James S. Sherman, then a member of the house, and several other colleagues in that body. One of the most ludicrous incidents of that trip has just come to light.

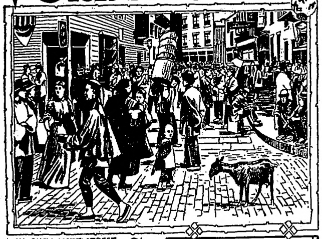
When the congressional party reached San Juan, Porto Rico, it met among other natives of the island a deep student of American politics. When he was introduced to Mr. Mann he grasped him cordially by the hand, and said:

"What! Is this Jim Mann of Chicago? I am very glad, indeed, to meet you, and I wish to say that I have read with interest everything you have said in the house of representatives during the last two years."

As his speech was made in a somewhat loud tone of voice, it reached the ears of several others in the party, and Mr. Sherman was seen advancing toward the native with outstretched hands.

"My name is Jim Sherman of Utica, N. Y.," he said, "and I want to meet you myself. If you have read everything Jim Mann has said in the house of representatives in the last two years I am willing to bet a panama hat that you have been the busiest man in this whose island."

NEW YORK'S CHINATOWN



IN BUSY MOTT STREET

ANOTHER civilization, gauged by other moral standards, restrained, or unrestrained, of other laws and codes, has for many years existed in New York under the eyes and noses of that city's people and their officials. In this sphere men and women have moved like the flotsam in an eddy, against the stream of the world without. The secret rules of the order provided the only known escape from the arm of the nation's law; they made men secure in the commission of atrocities and veiled the existence of a set of moral conditions almost beyond comprehension; certainly past momentary tolerance.

Over the whole was a hectic filament of romance and morbid interest which appeared to the chance passer or the sightseer to make the place a curiously fascinating corner transplanted from another world—far too original and alluring to be removed. They called it Chinatown. It is no place; it is no street in particular, though it has its center and its boundaries. It is rather a degenerate state of the senses.

New Yorkers know of it, of course, in a dim sort of way. Now and then there was a brawl, a killing of some Oriental or an opium den raid. These were matters of course. No one gave them more than passing attention.

To-day, however, New York knows Chinatown in its true perspective. The Elsie Sigel murder was the first rift in the cloud that obscured the fact. Now the mist itself is dissipated. New York knows that Chinatown—the spirit, not the place—is one of its cruel, almost unthinkable problems.

The latest outrage in Chinatown—a place that brews outrages faster than a quagmire hatches mosquitoes—is the abduction of a pretty mill girl of Weehawken and her imprisonment in a Chinese den, where she was subjected to horrifying cruelties.

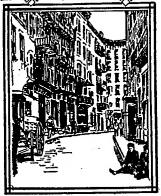
This most recent unfortunate is Christina Braun, 15 years old, blue-eyed and inclined to be just a little "wild." Christina's case differs from that of hundreds of other girls who have fallen victim to the lures of Chinatown only in the fact that she had the good fortune to escape before she became a slave to opium—the supreme evil of this most vicious hole in all the vast metropolis.

The girl went to Coney Island with some friends on a Sunday. She lost her companions in the crowd and, finally, after wandering about for a time, went into a chop suey "joint" to get a bite to eat. There she was drugged, and the next thing she remembers she was being carried through the labyrinthal hallway to a Chinatown den.

The girl fought desperately to get away from two Chinese who were dragging her along the floor of the dark hall, but she was beaten into insensibility. When she next recovered consciousness she was in a dimly lighted room and a hideous Chinaman was leaning over her, leering into her face.

Again the girl screamed and fought to get out of the place, but was knocked senseless. Between beatings she was made to understand that she was the slave of her captor and that the best thing she could do would be to remain quiet. But devious, dark and dirty as Chintown is, news will travel there, and the girl had not been in the den more than 24 hours before a "lobbygow"—a Chinaman who acts as stool pigeon and informer for the police—told two Mulberry street detectives that there was a white girl prisoner somewhere in the colony.

The men set watch and, after a time, succeeded in starving out and capturing Joe Wong, an Americanized Chinese gambler. The girl was found in Wong's room, her face so bruised that her friends had difficulty in recognizing her when they visited her at the headquarters of the Gerry society. Wong was locked up in the Tombs, but he probably will get out of the scrape on the ground that the girl willingly accompanied him to his lair.



CROOKED LITTLE DOYERS STREET

A regularly organized traffic in white and Chinese girl slaves exists in Chinatown and every detective who has worked in that section knows it now.

It is true that scores of women fall prey to the Chinese every year by first visiting Chinatown on slumming and sight-seeing trips. Others are attracted there by the gaudy tales about how kind and gentle the Chinese are to women; how well they clothe them and how liberal they are with money. These tales also are nearly all fakes. Anyone who has ever seen a real "hop joint" in Chinatown will never forget the dirt and degradation of it. Some of the wealthier Chinese have apartments that are fitted up in flashy oriental style, and a few of the gambling houses are well furnished. Three or four of the restaurants—maintly patronized by sight-seers—are gaudy in the extreme, but back behind all this, back beyond the tunnels, in the kitchens, the living quarters and up under the roofs of the tottering old buildings, exist squalor and misery such as can scarce be found elsewhere on this continent.

The pitiful story of Moy You and Ngeu Fung, two little Chinese girls, is enough to set the hand of all the world against the slave traders of Chinatown.

These girls were sold—it is believed by the police—to Chinese slave traders in China and smuggled into this country. They fell into the clutches of a Chinese merchant of some means in Chinatown and their tale of the cruelties to which they were subjected was brought to the attention of the Chinese charge d'affaires in Washington. The girls are in the hands of the Gerry society. They declare that they were compelled to work 20 hours a day at cooking, cleaning, scrubbing and covering button molds and that they were beaten almost every day.

Reading of these outrages the average American wonders why the perpetrators are not sent to prison, but it must be remembered that there are no men more wily and skillful in concocting false evidence than dishonest Americanized Chinese. It is next to impossible to obtain evidence against the slave traders of Chinatown that will stand in a court of justice. To begin with any Chinese witness who dares testify against one of his countrymen in New York takes his life in his hand. The boldness of the Chinatown slave trader is almost beyond belief.

Capt. Galvin of the police department, who is in charge of the precinct embracing Chinatown, has worked hard to "clean up" the place and drive the white women out of it, but his efforts have been of little avail. He has come to the conclusion that the "town" needs "cleaning out" instead of "cleaning up," and has recommended this action to Commissioner Baker.

If Galvin had his way he would keep slumming and sight-seeing parties out of Chinatown. The "rubberneck" wagon often is the net that drags the innocents to the dens.

WHEN SHOULD GIRLS MARRY?

A grandmother has undertaken to answer the question in the headline in a magazine article. Having had experience, she thinks she knows what she is talking about. It is her opinion that no girl should marry before she is 25 years old. There never has been and never can be any fixed rule for the mating of human beings. Ages ago parents were the sole arbiters of the marital destinies of their daughters. They gave in wedlock when and where and to whom they pleased, and the daughters had nothing to do with the bargain. The matter is one in which there is pretty nearly independence of thought and action on the part of American girls. Parents may try as they will to shape their daughters' love affairs to conform to their own ideas, but it is a rare case in which they succeed—and even then success on the part of the parents is not a guarantee of the girl's happiness. It has been estimated that a woman's chances of marriage begin to diminish at the twenty-fourth year and decline rapidly to the thirtieth year, when they have almost disappeared. The period of greatest expectation is from 19 to 23. It is between these periods that the majority of women must make up their minds, and they do it from the dictates of the heart oftener than from any other consideration.

The frequent assertion that the soils of the United States are wearing out is not conceded by Prof. Milton Whitney, chief of the bureau of soils, United States department of agriculture. He has prepared a bulletin in which statistics of yield since 1867 are carefully compared, and in which he arrives at the following conclusion: "We are producing more crops per acre than formerly. This is undoubtedly due to better and more intelligent cultivation, more and better systems of rotation of crops and in later years to the intelligent use of fertilizers through measures of control in the hands of every individual farmer." Much that has been said on the subject of exhaustion of the soil was alarming and even disheartening. That Prof. Whitney sees no reason for a pessimistic view is reasurring.

The bureau of statistics at Washington reports an enormous increase in building operations throughout the country. This is another sure indication of the revival of business activity in every direction. When financial stress is felt the work of building is one of the first to feel the effects. The Washington statement shows that the value of building permits issued in 100 of the largest cities in the United States for the year ended July 1, 1909, was $20,000,000 in excess of that for the same period in 1906, when building was at high tide. There have been noticeable gains in other directions, but in building the movement appears to be a veritable boom, owing to the demand for increased accommodations.

Dr. Stiles, chief government zoologist, has just given advice in a department bulletin for the treatment and eradication of the "book worm" or "lazy" disease so prevalent among the poor whites of the southern states. The disease produces an anaemic condition and an utter disinclination for labor. Judging from the latter symptom, it would seem that the "lazy worm" does not restrict its activities to sections south of Mason and Dixon's line. It is hardly lese majesty to rise up and assert that it has incubated in the municipal blood, in view of the exasperating delays in various movements planned for Philadelphia.

The sultan of Morocco's picturesque idea of locking the rebellious El Rhogi in a steel cage, strapped to the back of a swaying camel and marched, circus style, through the streets in a free parade, shows an oriental kind of humor hard for the western mind to appreciate. So is his humorous idea of punishment with boiling pitch in it. Somebody ought to remind him that this is sultans' bad day.

It requires some figuring to see how a New York woman could hire out for domestic service at $18 a month while herself keeping a servant at $22 a month. The answer is that she was lifting jewelry and the like from places where she was employed. After robbing 30 women this kitchen itinerant has gone to a reformatory for three years.

Germany grows about nine times as big a potato crop as the United States, although this country is much more than nine times as big as Germany. And some pessimists talk as if America were already near the limit of its possible food production.

The department of agriculture is now attacking the character of cats as rat-catchers. Their long standing as back-fence soloists, however, is still unquestioned by the department.

PRISON FOR WALSH

FORMER BANKER'S CONVICTION IS AFFIRMED BY COURT OF APPEALS.

AGED DEFENDANT IS ABSENT

Fight to Escape Five-Year Prison Term Ends in Defeat for Walsh—Case May Go to United States Supreme Court.

Chicago.—The United States circuit court of appeals Tuesday affirmed the guilt of John R. Walsh.

The heaviest blow yet to be dealt the former president of the Chicago National bank, and one-time power in the finacial world, came when Judge Peter S. Grosscup read the decision upholding the five-year prison sentence imposed by Judge A. B. Anderson of Indiana over a year and a half ago.

The attorneys for the defense now have 30 days in which to prepare an appeal to the appellate court for a rehearing. In case this is denied, and it is almost certain to be denied, Mr. Walsh's lawyers undoutedly will carry the case to the United States supreme court by means of an application for a writ of certtiorari.

Mr. Walsh, himself, who sat without show of emotion through the trying months of the long-drawn-out trial, was not in court to listen to the slowly uttered words that almost destroyed all hopes of averting the heavy penalty suspended over him.

The decision was handed down at the opening session of the October term of the court of appeals. A crowd had gathered to hear the momentous ruling, moved by curiosity or by sympathy for the man whose old age had reaped a harvest little foreseen in the years of his prosperity.

December 18, 1905, it was announced that John R. Walsh's banking institutions, the Chicago National and its two auxiliaries, the Home Savings and the Equitable Trust Company, had been declared insolvent by the authorities. With this announcement came the assurance that the banks of the city had rallied to the assistance of the depositors and would pay all indebtedness in full and hold steady the delicate balance of money affairs.

Charles H. Bosworth was the federal bank examiner who precipitated the closing of the banks. At one time Mr. Bosworth was the president of one of Mr. Walsh's railroads, the Southern Indiana, and thus had an opportunity to learn the manner in which the bank's funds were being used to build up this property.

17 MEN KILLED; 10 INJURED

Santa Fe Freight Collides with Work Train—Most of Victims are Mexicans.

Topeka, Kan.—Seventeen persons were killed and ten severely injured in a collision between a freight train and a construction train on the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe railroad near here, Friday.

Among the dead are 11 Mexicans, the remainder being section men.

The injured are all Mexicans and it is believed some of them are fatally injured.

The work train was backing into Topeka with 50 Mexicans riding on the flat cars. As the train was rounding a curve the north-bound freight crashed into it.

The engine on the freight ran over the four flat cars comprising the work train and almost a score of men were pinned down and it was several hours before they were extricated.

It is said the wreck was caused by the crew of the work train disregarding orders.

THROWS BOMB AT WEDDING

Jealous Man Takes Awful Revenge—Eight Persons Are Severely Injured.

Riemke, Germany. — During a dance given in this village, following a peasant wedding, an unknown man, thoroughly disguised, suddenly appeared on the scene and from the doorway threw a bomb among the dancers. Eight persons were severely wounded and several others slightly injured by the explosion. It is presumed the man acted through motives of jealousy. He made his escape.

SELLS POEM FOR BURIAL PLOT

HAD NEITHER WIFE NOR CHILDREN TO BURY HIM.

Legal Battle May Ensue Before Poet Can Rest in Peculiarly Purchased Grave.

New York. — Naphtali Herz Imber, a Hebrew poet and Zionist leader, who died here after a sudden attack of paralysis, probably will be buried in a grave which he bought many years ago, giving in exchange a 14-line poem in classic Hebrew. Legal documents found among Imber's papers told the story of this unusual barter of poetry for a burial plot.

"As I have neither wife nor children to bury me," says a memorandum in the poet's handwriting, "I have entered into this contract, whereby my friend, Usher Marcus, in consideration of a poem written by me and herewith conveyed to him, shall take charge of my body when I die and bury me in a plot which he has furnished."

When Marcus came to fulfill his contract he found that his right to take charge of the burial exercises of the poet was contested by a committee of Galicians, who declared that inasmuch as Imber had been born in Galicia theirs should be the honor of burying him and furnishing his grave. A legal battle may ensue before the poet is laid to rest.

Imber's death will be observed with a long period of mourning by many of New York's prominent East siders. He was best known among the Jews as the author of "Hatikvah," the Zionist national hymn, which is chanted by Zionists throughout the world.

TAFT SEES THE BIG TREES

Clad in Khaki, the President Views World's Wonders in the Yosemite Valley.

El Portal, Cal.—In this remote little settlement near the gateway of the Yosemite valley, one of the garden spots of the world and at the foot of the Sierras, President Taft spent Wednesday night in quiet sleep.

Clad in khaki riding breeches, soft shirt, khaki coat, boots and cap, President Taft Thursday started out of El Portal on a three-days' trip of sightseeing. By stage and on foot he will visit the giant Sequoias in the Mariposa big tree grove, will follow the roads and trails leading into the valley and will walk about the floor of that park to admire its imposing scenic splendor.

The visit to the big trees, said to be the oldest and the biggest of living things, came first in Mr. Taft's itinerary. Leaving by coach early he and his party were driven to Wawona at the edge of the grove where real monarchs of the forest grow to an altitude of more than 300 feet and more than 100 in circumference at the base.

Mr. Taft was driven through a tunnel cut through the base of one of the old trees which is said to have been standing from 3,000 to 5,000 years. The forenoon of Friday will be given over to the big trees, the president spending Thursday night at the hotel in Wawona.

WOULD ENJOIN HIS RIVAL

Candidate for Mayor Asks for Injunction on Ground of Ineligibility of His Opponent.

Louisville, Ky. — George D. Todd, Independent Republican candidate for mayor, instituted an injunction suit Thursday in the Jefferson circuit court against Mayor James F. Grinstead, who is the nominee of the "regular" Republicans, to succeed himself. In his petition, Mr. Todd declares that Grinstead is ineligible to hold the office of mayor, having been elected for one term, and quotes the constitutional inhibition. He declares that if County Clerk Gabhart is permitted to place Mayor Grinstead's name on the ballot as the Republican candidate, the voters will be misled to his (Todd's) disadvantage. He also alleges that in the event that Grinstead receives a plurality of the votes, he will be declared ineligible, thereby rendering a special election necessary.

JUSTICE MOODY VERY ILL

Advices from His Home Are That His Condition Is Desperate.

Washington. — Associate Justice William H. Moody of the supreme court of the United States may never again sit on that bench. Information received by friends in this city indicates that his condition as he lies ill in his home at Haverhill, Mass., is desperate.

It is said those admitted to the sick room have found Justice Moody so emaciated and racked by disease as to leave them slender hope of his restoration to health and strength.

Justice Moody was seized with rheumatism just before the close of the term of court last May.

ARREST EIGHT CITY OFFICERS

MARSHALLTOWN OFFICIALS ARE HALED INTO FEDERAL COURT.

Case Is Considered of Vital Importance in Iowa's Temperance Movement.

Davenport, Ia. — Mayor Oliver Ingledue of Marshalltown, Ia., Deputy Sheriff Nason, Samuel Wenger and Fitz Wenger, saloon keepers; Assistant Chief of Police Michael Clark, Police Sergt. Gooddale, Patrolman Matthew Jones and Frank Haas and Leon McNamara, a bartender, were taken before United States Judge Smith McPherson Thursday on a charge of conspiring to prevent a federal officer from doing his duty.

They were brought here from Marshalltown by United States Marshal Clark. Indictments were returned against them Tuesday by the federal grand jury.

Judge McPherson held the indicted men under bonds of $1,000 each to appear for trial at the next term of federal court in Des Moines. The defendants were given till Monday to furnish bonds at Des Moines.

Mayor Ingledue and his officers are charged with throwing Everett E. VanWert, a special officer of the United States Indian service, into jail at Marshalltown and keeping him there for more than 24 hours. VanWert had been detailed to investigate alleged sales of liquor at Marshalltown to Indians from the Tama reservation, some miles distant.

He is said to have sent an Indian into Wenger's saloon to buy liquor in order to obtain evidence. The Indian and Rev. Mr. Smith, a local minister, were arrested and placed in jail with VanWert.

Mayor Ingledue is a prominent member of the Order of Eagles and anti-saloon interests regard the case as one of the vital issues in the temperance movement sweeping over the state.

DEEP CHANNEL MEN MEET

Upper Mississippi River Improvement Association Is Holding Its Eighth Convention in Winona.

Winona, Minn.—The Upper Mississippi River Improvement association, whose object is to secure the early completion of the projecet for a depth of six feet in the channel at low water from Minneapolis to the mouth of the Missouri river, assembled here Wednesday in its eighth annual convention. President Thomas Wilkinson of Burlington, Ia., was in the chair and L. B. Boswell of Quincy, Ill., was secretary. Delegates are present from most of the cities and towns in the upper Mississippi valley.

Following an address of welcome from the mayor of Winona, President Wilkinson delivered his annual address and the other officers made their reports. Committees were appointed and the delegates then heard a number of talks on the deep channel. The convention will close Thursday evening with a banquet given by the citizens of Winona.

SERIOUS COLLISION ON I. C.

One Person Killed, 35 Injured—Most of the Victims Were State Fair Excursionists.

Springfield, Ill. — One person was killed outright and 35 persons were injured, four probably fatally, in a collision Tuesday between a state fair special taking home several hundred excursionists who had been attending the state fair in this city and a regular passenger train on the Illinois Central at Parnell, three miles south of Farmer City.

The dead:

Miss Clara Watson of Farmer City.

The wreck occurred on a sharp curve while the two trains were running at a high rate of speed and when the two engines came together with terrific force four of the coaches of the special were smashed.

Conductor Duncan of the special, himself seriously injured, limped into Farmer City and told of the wreck. Word was hurriedly sent to Clinton for a special train and in a few minutes five physicians were on the way to the scene of the wreck.

The body of Miss Watson was seen beneath the wreckage, but it was pinned down so that rescue was difficult. The fact that the wreckage did not catch fire is responsible for the number of dead and injured being so small, as many of the injured were pinned down under the debris.

THAW KEEPS UP THE FIGHT

Appeals from Order Denying Writ of Habeas Corpus and Refusing to Release Him.

Albany, N. Y. — Former Gov. Frank S. Black appeared before the court of appeals for Harry K. Thaw and attacked the constitutionality of the act under which Thaw was committed to the Matteawan State Hospital for the Criminal Insane, and the law under which Thaw is being detained in that institution.

Mrs. Thaw and her daughter, the former Countess of Yarmouth, listened to the arguments.

The case came up on an appeal from an order of the appellate division, affirming an order of Supreme Court Justice Mills of White Plains in dismissing a writ of habeas corpus and refusing to order Thaw's release.

Mr. Black contended that that section of the code under which Supreme Court Justice Dowling ordered Thaw committed was unconstitutional because the commitment was ordered without due process of law. He held that there was no proof that Thaw was insane at the time of his acquittal.

"When the verdict of that jury," said Mr. Black in referring to Thaw's acquittal, "was brought in, Thaw stood in that court a free and innocent man."

Whisky Goes Down.

Peoria. — A crop of two cents in the basis price of alcohol was announced here by Secretary Lofgren on the local board of trade. The Peoria price to-day is $1.35 instead of $1.37. This decrease is accounted for by a reduction of nine cents in the price of cash corn during the past 30 days.

Papke Defeats Willie Lewis.

Pittsburg, Pa.—Billy Papke, the Illinois thunderbolt, easily defeated Willie Lewis, the New York fighter, Friday night, according to the public verdict. Both men were standing at the end of the sixth round with Lewis all but out.

Drought Is Broken.

Hutchinson, Kan.—A prolonged drought was broken here by a fall of an inch and a quarter of rain. The rain fall was general throughout southwestern Kansas.

FREED AT LAST

From the Awful Tortures of Kidney Disease.

Mrs. Rachel Ivie, Henrietta, Texas, says: "I would be ungrateful if I did not tell what Doan's Kidney Pills have done for me. Fifteen years kidney trouble clung to me, my existence was one of misery and for two whole years I was unable to go out of the house. My back ached all the time and I was utterly weak, unable at times to walk without assistance. The kidney secretions were very irregular. Doan's Kidney Pills restored me to good health, and I am able to do as much work as the average woman, though nearly eighty years old."

Remember the name—Doan's. Sold by all dealers. 50 cents a box. Foster-Milburn Co., Buffalo, N. Y.

He Bit.

Ex-Police Commissioner Bingham of New York said of graft at a recent dinner:

"The grafter isn't so easily caught; he isn't quite so naive as an old fellow they used to tell about in Andover.

"This old fellow was suspected of tampering with the church collections. A couple of clumsy traps that were set for him failed to work. Then one day a young deacon walked past his house leading a new horse.

"'That's a fine horse, deacon,' the old fellow shouted. 'Did you buy him at the fair?'

"'Yes,' said the deacon. Then, as the other came nearer, he added:

"'I bought him with my pickings out of the collection plate.'

"The old man looked horrified.

"'Good gracious!' he said. 'I've often taken enough myself to buy a hat or a pair of trousers; but, deacon, in takin' enough to buy a horse ain't ye committin' a positive sin!'"

Complementary Colors.

Recent experiments, the results of which have been placed before the Academy of Sciences in Paris, appear to demonstrate that the true complementary colors of the spectrum have not hitherto been recognized. Red was formerly considered to be the complement of green, yellow of violet and blue of orange. But according to Mr. Rosenstiel, the complementaries of red and orange are neither green nor blue, but two greenish-blue tints, and the complement of yellow is blue, and not violet, which is the complement of green. Mr. Rosenstiel has accordingly formed a new "chromatic circle" for the use of artists, which he believes is more correct than its predecessors.—Youth's Companion.

True Representative of Race.

Dr. Bethmann-Hollweg may claim this distinction, that he is the first German chancellor to wear a beard. Bismarck hastened to shave his off when he entered upon diplomacy, and showed his rivals and enemies a massive jaw and clear-cut chin; and he shaved to the end, with an interval enforced by neuralgia in the early '80s. As a soldier, too Caprivi shaved, all but his mustache, and so did Hohenlohe and Bulow. But Bethmann-Hollweg is gaunt, rugged, hirsute, pan-Germanic.

Will Seek the South Pole.

A. Henry Savage Landor, the English explorer, who will soon make an attempt to reach the south pole, is of the opinion that Lieut. Shackleton failed through having a cumbersome and unnecessarily large expedition. Mr. Landor's theory is that a small caravan of trusted and hardy men, lightly equipped as in his expeditions through Asia and Africa, is best. Mr. Landor's activity in aeronautic investigations gives color to the rumor that an airship will be used by him in his expedition.

FOOD QUESTION

Settled with Perfect Satisfaction by a Dyspeptic.

It's not an easy matter to satisfy all the members of the family at meal time as every housewife knows.

And when the husband has dyspepsia and can't eat the simplest ordinary food without causing trouble, the food question becomes doubly annoying.

An Illinois woman writes:

"My husband's health was poor, he had no appetite for anything I could get for him, it seemed.

"He was hardly able to work, was taking medicine continually, and as soon as he would feel better would go to work again only to give up in a few weeks. He suffered severely with stomach trouble.

"Tired of everything I had been able to get for him to eat, one day seeing an advertisement about Grape-Nuts, I got some and tried it for breakfast the next morning.

"We all thought it was pretty good although we had no idea of using it regularly. But when my husband came home at night he asked for Grape-Nuts.

"It was the same next day and I had to get it right along, because when we would get to the table the question, 'Have you any Grape-Nuts' was a regular thing. So I began to buy it by the dozen pkgs.

"My husband's health began to improve right along. I sometimes felt offended when I'd make something I thought he would like for a change, and still hear the same old question, 'Have you any Grape-Nuts?'

"He got so well that for the last two years he has hardly lost a day from his work, and we are still using Grape-Nuts." Read the book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

CHEER GOPHER GIRL

MISS SCHALLER PRESENTS SILVER SERVICE TO BATTLESHIP "MINNESOTA."

EUGOLIZES THE DEAD GOVERNOR

Young Woman Who Christened Ship Fours Years Ago, Delivers State's Gift to War Vessel.

New York.—Standing in front of the great after 12-inch turret of the battleship Minnesota, Miss Rosemarie Schaller, of Hastings, Minn., as the official representative of her state, presented to that battleship what is said to be the most magnificent silver service ever given to an American warship. Four years ago Miss Schaller had broken the bottle of wine on the bow of the giant fighter as she left the ways and she became the first woman in the navy's history to officially represent a state in making the customary presentation of a silver service to a new warship.

Miss Schaller, a tall, graceful girl, dressed in white and wearing a large hat covered with white plumes, made a pretty picture as she faced Commander William S. Sims, of the battleship, to whose custody as the representative of the navy department, the service was intrusted. The blue-jackets were massed on the top of the turret and on the bridge behind Miss Schaller while she was speaking, and when she had ended the sailors cheered uproariously for the girl whose picture has held the place of honor in the captain's quarters of the Minnesota since she went into commission over two years ago.

The late Governor Johnson, of Minnesota, was to have accompanied the Minnesota delegation to New York had he lived, and Miss Schaller's little speech of presentation was largely a eulogy of the dead executive of her state, to whom, with tears in her eyes, she referred as 'one who had forever entrenched himself in the hearts of Minnesotans."

More than 300 guests were present. Captain Hugo Osterhaus, commanding the second division of the Atlantic fleet; Commander Sims, Flag Lieutenants Berry, Lieutenant King, Captain Osterhaus' aid, and Lieutenant Commanders W. K. Harrison, O. P. Jackson, I. C. Wettengel and R. I. Curtin received the guests on the after-deck of the battleship.

The silver service of fifty-six pieces had been placed on an onyx table and covered with a large American flag that was not removed until Miss Schaller had been introduced. Behind Miss Schaller, as she spoke, was a stand of colors that were also presented to the ship by the state, whose name she bears. Commander Sims himself was not forgotten, and when the ship presentations were over, J. Harry Lewis, of St. Paul, presented the commander with a gold cigaret case.

GOVERNMENT FACES REVOLT.

Cass County Villages Face Serious Conflict With Federal Authority

Manhnomen, Minnesota.—About 20 persons, purporting to be deputy United States marshals, arrived in Mahnomen and proceeded to destroy the property of the five saloons doing business in this town.

The police authorities of the town and its residents deny the jurisdiction of the federal government within the incorporation limits of the town, and as a result the deputy marshals have all been arrested for destroying property.

Excitement is running high and the outcome is awaited with interest.

Mahnomen, Minn.—Assistant Distric Attorney Oakley has arrived from St. Paul to defend the men arrested here by the town authorities for raiding saloons, and destroying property. It is asserted that the accused are members of the Indian police and not deputy United States marshals.

The arrest of special officers and government men at Mahnomen means that local authorities in the districts which have been warned to cease the sale of liquor will fight the government's crusade for the enforcement of treaty provisions with the Indians of Minnesota. In Cass county alone, fifty-eight saloons have been notified to close their doors, and developments in Mahnomen county are believed to be merely a forerunner of a sensational government raid on Cass county. The treaty made with the Chippewa Indians in 1858 binds the government to the enforcement of anti-liquor laws in the district covered by the treaty.

Sauk Center, Minn.—The plant of the Keller Manufacturing Company was destroyed by fire, except the foundry, warehouse and lumber yard.

HUMANE ASSOCIATION MEETS.

Thirty-Third Annual Session of the National Organization Is Opened.

St. Paul.—The thirty-third annual meeting of the American Humane association opened today in the Old Capitol on Wabasha street. The meeting will last three days, with sessions morning and afternoon. This evening the delegates will be given a dinner by the St. Paul society, and tomorrow evening a big public meeting will be held.

$25,000 FOR MEMORIAL.

Commission Sets This Sum as the Mark to be Reached.

St. Paul.—With approximately $8,000 already raised, an effort is to be made to close the Governor John Albert Johnson Memorial fund with a total of at least $25,000 by Nov. 1. A resolution to this effect was passed at the meeting of the commission at the Minnesota club.

The commission organized by electing the following: President, C. D. O'Brien, St. Paul; vice president, A. C. Weiss, Duluth; secretary, C. W. Ames, St. Paul; treasurer, B. F. Nelson, Minneapolis. These, with D. M. Neill, of Red Wing, will comprise the executive board of the commission, which decided that hereafter the organization shall be known as "The Governor John Albert Johnson Memorial Commission."

According to the constitution adopted, each member of the commission, in his respective locality, may receive contributions, which, together with the names of the donors, shall immediately be transferred to the treasurer.

$1.00 The Limit.

As has been generally understood, contributions shall be limited to $1 and no benefit performance receipts will be accepted, although any existing organization may contribute as it sees fit.

The design, location and character of the memorial were not taken up, but these will be disposed of within the near future.

A resolution was passed by the commission urging the people to send in contributions as soon as possible. The resolution follows:

"The Governor John Albert Johnson Memorial commission, having been fully organized, requests that all contributions to the memorial fund be at once remitted to B. F. Nelson, treasurer, at 728 Security bank building, Minneapolis."

Another resolution passed by the board was:

Thanks The Press.

"Whereas, a movement has been inaugurated to erect a statue in his honor by popular subscription of amounts not exceeding $1, so that it may stand through the ages to come as a people's tribute in recognition of the services to the state of John Albert Johnson; and

"Whereas, the newspapers of the state can and are furthering and supporting the movement; therefore, be it

"Resolved, that The Governor John Albert Johnson Memorial Commission acknowledges and tenders thanks to the newspapers of of Minnesota for their valuable aid;

WANTS DOCKS AND LEVEES.

Speaker Urges Importance of Landings On Waterways Convention.

Winona, Minn.—"To stimulate the growth of commerce along the river is the object of this association," said Congressman J. J. Esch, of La Crosse, one of the principal speakers of the Upper Mississippi River Improvement Association Convention.

"We can restore river navigation and will do so by continually appealing to congress and making our appeals so strong and convincing that they will not be able to resist. There should be a definite amount appropriated annually. Another way we can aid the project after the appropriation is received is by installing proper terminals and other facilities which are necessary if we wish to compete with the railroads, such as docks and warehouses."

Mr. Esch also urged that some action be taken looking to the improvement of the present navigation laws. The address of the Wisconsin congressman summed up the object of the organization and was delivered in a forceful manner before the 200 delegates who had assembled for the afternoon session.

CALLS ROOSEVELT GAME SAVER.

Humane Society Convention Hears Nation's Nimrod Defended.

St. Paul.—Deploring the example set by Theodore Roosevelt, in his widely advertised hunting trips, but contending that the strenuous president saved the lives of more animals than he killed, Superintendent D. Lange, of the Humbolt school, St. Paul, read before the convention of the American Humane society a paper on 'The Sportsman and His Relation to Humane Work."

"In the establishment of game reserves,' said Mr. Lange, "no man has done more effective work than former President Roosevelt, although many good citizens deplore, and deplore justly, the influence his widely advertised hunting trips have upon American boys, but there is no doubt that President Roosevelt has saved the lives of many more wild animals than he has ever killed, or ever can kill on his hunting trips."

The society is now holding its twenty-third annual meeting in the old capitol.

SHOOTS TO SETTLE BILL.

Quarrel Over Board Ends In Murderous Attack and Suicide.

Duluth, Minn.—A double tragedy occurred at Tower, Minn. William Coija shot Jacob Leinonen and then committed suicide. Leinonen is not expected to live.

The two men quarreled about a bill which Coija owed for board at Leinonen's boarding house. They were on their way to the sawmill where both worked when the dispute began.

HANS WANGER NAMES HIS OWN SALARY

Along about March 21 each year Hans Wagner, the great Pittsburg shortstop, who leads the National league in batting, gets a letter that reads something like this:

"Dear Hans: Inclosed is a contract for the coming baseball season. It is all blank, as you will see. Fill it out to suit yourself, Hans; but in fixing your salary please remember that times are very bad. Still, we must have you and will pay whatever you say."

Hans gets this letter while he is at the office of the independent steel plant that he and his brother own. He studies the statistics and finds that 366,427 persons paid to see the games at Pittsburg last year. Then back goes this letter to Barney Dreyfus:

"Mien Lieber Barney: Yours chust received. Times was pretty hard here, too. I hardly ever saw der rail markets so bad. But maybe I get away this summer for a little while if you pay me $12,000. I hate to say this, but what can I do?"

This is a fact—Hans fixes his salary, and expert opinion is that it is $2,000 a month for six months.

And here's the point: There are a lot of Hans Wagners, big and little, in thebaseball business, and any undertaking that can pay such salaries may be regarded as having reached that dignity which entitles it to be called an industry.

Most of the baseball fans may not know that there is such a thing as the baseball industry of the United States, but there is. Nor can it be described without the use of big figures. It is great in income, great in expenditure, great in the number of men employed and still greater in the number of patrons.

CLARKE FOUR TIME WINNER

Pittsburg Leader Holds the Record Among Managers for Baseball Pennant Victories.

Pittsburg, which clinched the honors as champion of the National league for 1909, also won the pennant in 1901, 1902 and 1903, giving Manager Clarke the distinction of being the only manager in the National league with a record of four pennants. Only three other managers of major league clubs ever surpassed this record. They were Anson, Selee and Hanlon, whose teams won the pennants five times.

Five players hold the record of being members of a club that won the pennant four times. They are Manager Clarke, Shortstop Wagner, Center Fielder Leach and Pitchers Leever and Phillippe.

Pittsburg is the best hitting team in either major league, having 1,282 bingles to their credit, including 204 doubles, 88 triples and 24 home runs, and is second in fielding, Chicago being first.

The Pittsburg team is strong in having the second division of its lineup the hardest-hitting aggregation of any second division in any major league club. These men are Miller, Abstein, Wilson and Gibson.

Another interesting feature is that O'Connor was catching for the team when the pennant was clinched and the only other game he caught this year was on May 5, when his three hits helped Pittsburg defeat Chicago, thus placing Pittsburg in the lead in the race. Catcher George Gibson has caught 130 consecutive games.

Loses Flag on Home Run.

Des Moines won the pennant in the Western league by a remarkable series of games, the winner being unsettled until the very last ball was thrown. Des Moines won over Sioux City by just two points. Sioux City stood at the head of the column, with Des Moines second. Sioux City was scheduled to play two games against Omaha and Des Moines one with Lincoln. In order for Des Moines to win the pennant it was necessary for Omaha to win both games and Des Moines to win its game with Lincoln. Des Moines won and Omaha took the first game from Sioux City. With Sioux City two scores to the good in the seventh inning of the second game and Omaha with two runners on bases Kane of Omaha hit for a home run and won the last game.

Facts For Sick Women

We know of no other medicine which has been so successful in relieving the suffering of women, or secured so many genuine testimonials, as has Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

In almost every community you will find women who have been restored to health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Almost every woman you meet has either been benefited by it, or knows some one who has.

In the Pinkham Laboratory at Lynn, Mass., are files containing over one million one hundred thousand letters from women seeking health, in which many openly state over their own signatures that they have regained their health by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has saved many women from surgical operations.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is made exclusively from roots and herbs, and is perfectly harmless.

The reason why it is so successful is because it contains ingredients which act directly upon the female organism, restoring it to healthy and normal activity.

Thousands of unsolicited and genuine testimonials such as the following prove the efficiency of this simple remedy.

Minneapolis, Minn.:—"I was a great sufferer from female troubles which caused a weakness and broken down condition of the system. I read so much of what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound had done for other suffering women, I felt sure it would help me, and I must say it did help me wonderfully. Within three months I was a perfectly well woman.

"I want this letter made public to show the benefits to be derived from Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound."—Mrs. John G. Moldan, 2115 Second St. North, Minneapolis, Minn.

Women who are suffering from those distressing ills peculiar to their sex should not lose sight of these facts or doubt the ability of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to restore their health.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Red Lake County Minnesota.

Subscription price $1.00 per year in advance. If not paid in advance $1.50

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879

Gov. Eberhart will spek at the Crookston fair on Friday October 22nd, and will be heard by a large number of northern Minnesotians for the first time.

The early freeze up has caught the farmers of northern Minnesota proper, as there is a very small amount of fall plowing done, and lots of threshing to do, and thousands of acres of potatoes still in the ground While this has been a very good crop year, it has been a bad season to save all kinds of crops and to cap off all the other bad weather we get this early freeze up.

Both the O'Brien and Kratka ferrys have been sank in the river, just at the time they were most needed, and it has been suggested that we name one of them Oosahl, and the other one Hanson, in honor of our two legistative members that headed the farmers off from geting a bridge accross this river at some point in eastern Red Lake county.

WILL PASS THE BILL

Under the present law we do not understand that purchasers of land on the elevn townships have seven years in which to make final proof even if they have made their payments on time. But Congressman Steenerson hes introduced the following bill in congress, which he expects to get passed at the December session.

"That entrymen on ands ceded under the Act of February 20th, 1904, who have complied with the requirements of the homestead law as to residance and improvements are hereby granted an exension until seven years after the date of their entries in which to make final proof and payment therefor."

The above bill although short covers all the ground so far as the actual residant homesteader is concerned, and as Congressman Steenerson has a record of passing local measures for the bennefit of his constituents the bill will undoubtly become a law at the next session of congress.

A Long Time Dying.

Mr. Fred Terry told this anecdote of the death scene in "The Heel of Achilles:"

"One day," he says, "we were rehearsing this play, and a member of my company came in from the street and asked the call boy how far the rehearsal had got.

"'Mr. Terry's just dying,' replied the boy.

"'Good. I've time to smoke a cigarette before my entrance.'

"Presently the actor returned and repeated the question.

"'Still dying,' answered the boy.

"'Oh, I'll go and have another cigarette, then.'

"Back he came and only got the same reply from the call boy.

"Finally, after smoking five cigarettes, he asked, a little wearily, how far the rehearsal had gone.

"'Still dying,' answered the call boy.

"'Great Scott!' gasped the actor. 'He must be immortal.'" — London Answers.

The First Language.

No one of the existing languages has any legitimate claim to be considered the original of the family of languages, standing to the others as Latin, for instance, stands to Italian and French. Of an original primitive language of mankind the most patient research has found no trace. All of them—Assyrian, Phoenician, Hebrew, Arabic—are sister languages, pointing back to an earlier parent language, which has long disappeared. Since the historical period man has done little in the way of the absolute creation of language. The work had already been accomplished ages before the birth of written inscriptions.—New York American.

MAGNETISM.

Some of the Peculiar Properties of This Strange Force.

The true nature of magnetism as such, of course, is not known. All that we can be sure of is that magnetic attraction does not radiate outward in all directions as does light, but simply acts along lines consisting of closed curves and called lines of force, these lines connecting the two poles and not extending very far outward between them. These curves may be found very nicely by placing a horseshoe magnet under a thin sheet of paper and sprinkling iron filings on top. The filings will collect along the lines.

Now, as to the different kinds of magnets, there are natural, artificial and electro magnets. The natural ones are found as magnetic ore in the earth, the artificial ones are made by stroking a piece of iron or steel with a magnet, and the electro magnets are caused by the action of an electric current.

Some peculiar things have been noticed in regard to magnetism, among which are the following facts:

It has been observed that fire irons that have rested in one position during the summer months are often highly magnetized, no doubt having been caused by the magnetism of the earth itself by the process known as induction. Other iron articles that stay in one position and do not come in contact with fire or other heat are often found in the same condition, such as iron bars to jail windows and iron railings in front of houses.

The most peculiar observation made, however, was that the upper part of the steel tire of a carriage wheel attracts the north pole of a magnet, while the bottom part, or part in contact with the earth, attracts the south pole. This is in the northern hemisphere only and is fully in accord with the theory of induced magnetism. Of course in the southern hemisphere, where the earth is under the influence of the south magnetic pole, the conditions are reversed.

A magnet dipped into boiling water loses a great part of its magnetism, which is miraculously restored to it on becoming cool again.

A sharp blow given to a magnet will cause it to lose its magnetism. Also the application of heat will have a like effect.

If a magnetic needle be placed over a rapidly revolving plate of copper, although it be separated from it by a thick plate of glass, the needle will revolve in the same direction as the plate.—Exchange.

THE ELEPHANT IN BATTLE.

Most Docile Yet Courageous and Faithful of Animals.

Of the docility of the elephant there is no need to multiply examples. It is said that in India native women sometimes when called away intrust their babies to the care of "the handed one," confident that they will be safe and tenderly handled.

But of all elephant stories surely the finest is that which tells how the standard bearing elephant of the Pelshwa won a great victory for its Mahratta lord. At the moment when the elephant had been told to halt its mahout was killed. The shock of battle closed around it, and the Mahratta forces were borne back, but still the elephant stood, and the standard which it carried still flew, so that the Pelshwa's soldiers could not believe that they were indeed being overcome and, rallying, in their turn drove the enemy backward till the tide swept past the rooted elephant and left it towering colossal among the slain. The fight was over and won, and then they would have had the elephant move from the battlefield, but it waited still for the dead man's voice.

For three days and nights it remained where it had been told to remain, and neither bribe nor threat would move it till they sent to the village on the Nerbudda, a hundred miles away, and fetched the mahout's little son, a round eyed, lisping child, and then at last the hero of that victorious day, remembering how its master had often in brief absence delegated authority to the child, confessed its allegiance and with the shattered battle harness clanging at each stately stride swung slowly along the road behind the boy.—London Times.

A Little Crowded.

A backwoodsman went to New York city for the first time, says the Saturday Evening Post. He stopped at a Broadway hotel which was pretty well downtown. Next morning his nephew, who lives in New York, came to take him out and show him the sights. They walked down Broadway until they got to Canal street. The backwoodsman stopped and contemplated the great congestion of traffic there, hundreds of trucks going every way.

"Son," he said to his nephew, "you have a nice city here, but it 'pears to me that your folks is a hull passel behind in their haulin'."

Must Suit All Tastes.

"My wife wonders why the papers waste so much space on mere news."

"What does she read?"

"Oh, she reads the weather probabilities, the bargain probabilities, the marriage notices and the love story. But an item about a big battle or the fall of a dynasty looks piffling to her."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Animals He Had Met.

Little Harry was visiting in the country and while there became very much attached to his cousin's pet dog. "Haven't you any animals at home?" he was asked.

"Oh, yes," replied the little fellow. "We have roaches and flies."—Chicago News.

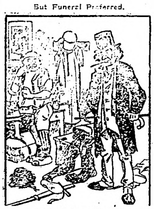
But Funeral Preferred.



The Successful Comedian—Cheer up, old man. We all have our trials.

The Disappointed Tragedian—It's a comfortable reflection. I shall certainly attend yours.

He Was.

"Owen Flannagan! Are you Owen Flannagan?" said the clerk of the court.

"Yes, begorra," replied the prisoner, with a merry twinkle in his eye. "I'm owin' everybody!"—London Mail

Don't keep so busy making money to afford pleasure that you have no time to devote to pleasure.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

JUST IN TIME.

The Squire Wasn't Actually Nigh, but He Was a Little Close.

They were discussing the salient traits of old Squire Gregson's character, the funeral being a thing of the past. "Some way or 'nother, between his goin' an' the buryin', nobody felt free to speak," Abel Nutting had said as an introduction to his remarks. "It seemed more'n likely he'd come to again an' call us to account, same as usual."

"He was free to give to phylanthropy an' the church," said Barton Sedgwick when his turn came, "but in the fam'ly circle I called him kind o' close. I won't go so fur's to say he was actu'lly nigh, but he cert'nly was kind o' close."

"As how?" inquired three voices in unison. They all had plenty of instances of the old squire's "closeness," but it was Barton's privilege to speak first, he being a cousin once removed.

"Well, I was there to a Sunday dinner with him last December," said Barton slowly. "He invited Sally an' me, same as always, once a year.

"Well, Sally had one o' those stuffy colds that make you feel worse'n if you had pneumony, an' she vowed she wouldn't go. She said she couldn't taste anything anyway, an' the mere thoughts o' his cold pork an' boiled potatoes went against her. But she wanted I should go for policy, same as all us relations went, an' I did.

"Well, when I got there an' told squire he said, 'Sally not comin'!' an' clipped it right out into the kitchen, leavin' the doors open all the way.

"'Here,' he said to old Jane Wills, that cooked an' done for him, 'have those potatoes boiled soft yet? That's good. You lift out Mis' Sedgwick's potato, an' it'll be just right to fry for my breakfast tomorrow,' he said, 'for Mis' Sedgwick is kep' at home with a cold. Lift it out careful! That's right!'

"An' when he come back to me he was all creased up with smiles, he was so pleased with himself." — Youth's Companion.

SEEING UNDER WATER.

The Refraction of Light and the Limiting Angle of Vision.

One of the most peculiar things in connection with life under water is what is known as the limiting angle of vision. This applies to fishes, divers, submarine crews and, in fact, any being possessing the power of sight and desiring to look through the water at objects in the air. The effect is not due to a defect in vision, but to the refraction or bending of light, and no telescope or other optical instrument can get around it.

The effect consists of the impossibility of seeing anything on the outside unless the observer directs his line of sight within forty-eight degrees of the vertical. If a forty-nine degree angle or over is taken, the surface, no matter how clear the water is, acts as a perfect mirror and reflects objects at the bottom of the water, thus not allowing anything on the outside to be seen. The consequence of this property is the most startling of all, for everything on the outside can be seen and thus has to be seen in the cone described by the forty-eight degree angle from the eye. This shows all outside objects huddled together and appearing high in air. Thus, if one dives into the middle of a wide river, on looking up the banks will appear close together, but, at a great distance from the observer, high in air.

This angle is called the "critical" angle and of course varies with the two media in contact.

If one desires to make the experiment a square glass box or an aquarium will answer very well. Suspend this from the ceiling or support it on a wall bracket and look under it at an angle. The phenomenon will be observed as indicated. The clearer the water and the stronger the light the more clearly will things appear.—Chicago Record-Herald.

Why He Was a Heathen.

Sir Arthur Fanshaw related an amusing story of a Mohammedan servant who when asked his religion replied:

"Beg pardon, sar, I'm a heathen."

When asked by his master what he meant by a heathen the man answered:

"Beg pardon, sar, a worshiper of stocks and stones."

"Confound it," remarked the master, "I can't keep a man like that in my service."

To which came the immediate rejoinder:

"Beg pardon, sar, in your highness' service no time to worship anything!"—London News.

He Spoke Too Soon.

A well known business man attended his daughter's commencement exercises at an eastern college. He had been greatly pleased with the beauty and dignity of the exercises and was discoursing to his wife upon the refining influences of college life. Suddenly his impressive monologue was cut short. A girl in cap and gown came dashing down the steps of the main hall waving her diploma and shouting, "Educated, by gosh!"—Ladies' Home Journal.

Not Anxious.

"You have quite a number of the poets," said Goodby, who was inspecting Woodby's library. "Ah, there's Browning! Do you understand him?"

"No; I don't," said Woodby.

"Ah," said Goodby, continuing his examination, "have you Praed?"

"Certainly not. What's the use of praying? I ain't anxious to understand him."—Philadelphia Record.

Rush the fall plowing, if the weather does permit

Did you prepare for winter last week? It's onto you.

Walter McAndress was transacting business at Thief River Falls Monday and Tuesday.

Stephen Singer the Kratka merchant made a business trip to Thief River Falls Monday, returning Wednesday.

This is the kind of weather that begins to make a fellow begin to think of what he has done with his summer wages.

Mr. Cousins, a relative of Jim O'Brien arrived from New Jersy last week with his family and may decide to buy a farm and make his home here.

The grand opening ball of the season will be held at the Kratka hall, on Saturday evening October 30th.. First class music. All are invited

Mr. George Singer received a letter from Mr. S. Pelka, of Gully last week, stateing that the new Soo road passed through both his and Mr. Singers farms.

All kinds of tame strawberry plants for sale, by John Wjientek, the Hilda Nurseryman. Now is a good time of year to fix up a nice strwberry bed for next season.

Edward Singer passed by this way Monday going over to Kratka to look after their store over there during the absence of his brother Stephen at Thief River Falls.

Sunbeam mail carrier C.L. Clark had to turn back from the bad swamp Tuesday, as it was not froze solid enough to bare up a team, and to much for them to breake it.

There is a good prospect that the weather will turn fair again today, which is to be hoped for. Three week fine Indian summer weather would help out the fall work wonderfully.

C.H. Martze came up Monday with a crew of men to survey and lay out the Highlanding county ditches. He will take the levels and lay out the ditches so work can commence on them early in the spring.

How long is it since you paid any subscription to THE SUNBEAM? Don't you begin to think it is about time to remit? Do so today, at our expense. We will pay for the registering of your letter.

Mr. Charles Fellman, of St. Hilaire is up here with the C. H. Martz surveying party, with a big pair of hip boots on taking soundings of the swamps, so he will know just where to cross next year shou'd he become a candidate for office.

"Second fiddle Willie" the Deer Park ex-town clerk has been so busy counting the hairs on the top of our head that he has not had time to do his fall plowing, but mabe he can get his chattel mortgages extended for another year and can pay his other bills with wind, of the kind he paid his shares in the farmers steam boat with.

A good way to get the water out of the Hon. Hanson and Opsahl ferrys would be to take an empty pork barrel and put a big bale in it, then rig it up on skids with ropes and pullys so a horse could be used to hawl the water the same as they fill large road tanks in the lumber woods, and the water could be baled out of them ferrys in a hurry. P. S. If you have not got an empty pork barrel Hanson, or Opsahl might let you have one of them that they brought home from the legislature last winter.

Pay up your back subscription while you can settle at the rate of $1. a year.

We have been putting in a big share of our time getting ready ready for winter this week, and we are about well prepared, so we can set more type next week

Mrs. Ole Nesland visited with the family of A, Rolandson on Wednesday.

Mr. H.M. Lillo made a business trip to Red Lake Falls on Saturday.

Pattie Short and Gunder Lintvet returned home from Pettisburg last Saturday.

Mr. and Mrs. Jim Walker went down to Red Lake Falls on last Thursday, where Mrs. Walker went to consult an eye doctor.

Mr. John Gunderson left for Canada on last Saturday for a visit with friends and relatives

Mr. Ruststene from Plummer was around buying cattle this week.

Mr. M. Rodman moved up a load of household goods from Hill River to his Deer Park farm Monday.

Mr. Ralph Hofstad made a business trip to Plummer on Thursday.

Mr. William Lindberg returned home from Dakota Thursday.

Building Up a Speech.

Before making a speech Charles Dickens would decide on his various heads and then in his mind's eye liken the whole subject to the tire of a cart wheel, he being the hub. From the hub to the tire he would run as many spokes as there were subjects to be treated, and during the progress of the speech he would deal with each spoke separately, elaborating them as he went round the wheel, and when all the spokes dropped out one by one and nothing but the tire and space remained he would know that he had accomplished his task and that his speech was at an end.

Doing It.

Old Lady (to grocer's boy)—Don't you know that it is very rude to whistle when dealing with a lady?

Boy—That's what the guv'nor told me to do, mum.

"Told you to whistle?"

Running Conversation.

Collector (angrily)—You know very well, sir, that this bill has been running several years. Now, I put it up to you, what do you want me to do with it? Debtor—By George, I'd enter it in the next Marathon race if I were you!—Puck.

What Did He Mean?

"Yes; I believe that every intelligent woman should have a vote."

"But, senator, I understand that you were opposed to women's suffrage!"

"I am."—Judge.

Hunting For Justice.

Justice is of course loudly demanded by every litigant in a court of law, but it is a frequent infirmity of the human mind to confuse justice with one's own cause. The late Thomas B. Reed, according to a writer in Law Notes, used to tell an amusing story to illustrate this tendency.

He was once retained by an enterprising client to prosecute an action. On talking with the plaintiff's witnesses Mr. Reed found that their stories were far from consistent, so he reported the fact to his client and advised that the suit be dropped. The client was somewhat perturbed, but told the attorney he would have a talk with the witnesses and let him know the next morning what he had decided to do. True to his word, he dropped in bright and early, wearing the cheerful look of one who has fought the good fight.

"I've seen those witnesses," he explained, "and they say they must have been mistaken when they talked with you. They all see it alike now. I've also seen some of the jurymen, and they think I'll win. Now, if there's such a thing as justice in law we can't lose."

Home Helps.

When one has an old barn roof to remove do not try the ancient, laborious way of pulling out the nails. Take a magnet and hold it over the head of the nail till the nail comes out.

To keep the hands perfectly clean and white while the stove is being polished let some one else polish it. There are other alleged methods, but this will prove surest.

The best way to mark an umbrella is to embroider the name of the owner on the little strap for fastening it when it is rolled. Then the person who swipes it can destroy the mark without mutilating any vital part of the umbrella.

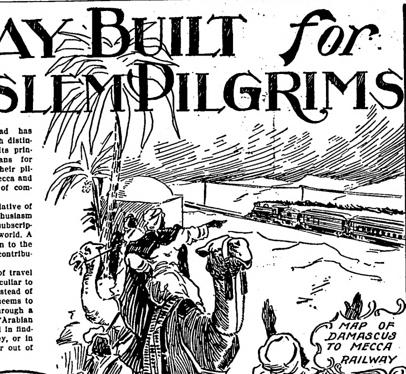
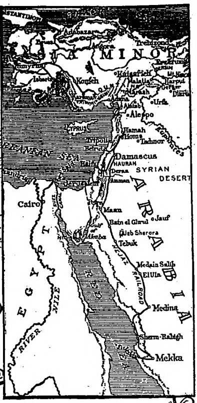
RAILWAY BUILT for MOSLEM PILGRIMS





MAP OF DAMASCUS TO MECCA RAILWAY

THE Damascus to Mecca railroad has many remarkable features which distinguish it from other lines. Its principal object is to provide a means for faithful Moslems to perform their pilgrimage to the holy places of Mecca and Medina with a greater degree of comfort than formerly.

Its inception is due to the initiative of the present sultan, and the enthusiasm created by its first announcement brought in subscriptions from the faithful in all parts of the Islamic world. A special stamp-tax forms a solid annual contribution to the expenses, somewhat less evanescent than other contributions may prove to be.

Geographically, the line has provided a means of travel in a country with a fascination of scenery quite peculiar to itself and unlike any other part of the world. Instead of traversing populous countries and great cities, it seems to delight in passing through immense solitudes—through a country peopled mainly by the spirits of the "Arabian Nights," where little surprise would be occasioned in finding a roc's egg in some inhospitable, rocky valley, or in seeing a genie floating in a stream of thin vapor out of a magic bottle.

MOSLEM VILLAGE WOMEN

TOMBS AT MEDAIN SALIH

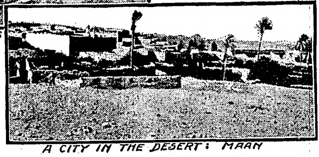
The line commences at the traditional parting-place of the great pilgrimage, the Bawaubet Allah, or Gate of Allah, in Damascus. For the first few miles the line traverses the Hauran, running parallel to the French Hauran railroad. From ancient times this district has been an extremely rich one, and the Romans used it as a granary.

The deep, narrow ravines of the Yarmuk, the ancient Hieroymax, which the line follows in its descent to the Jordan, present several difficulties of engineering successfully overcome. Large numbers of Italian, Montenegrin, Croatian, Greek, and other European workmen had to be employed on the difficult rock cuttings, tunnels, and viaducts of this section.

The Jordan valley, where the line crosses it, is 800 feet below Mediterranean level; but the difficulties of construction cease when the Yarmuk valley has been successfully traversed, and the ascent to the sea is made by easy gradients.

MOUTAKA PILLARS IN ARABIA

FIRST TRAIN LEAVING DAMASCUS



A CITY IN THE DESERT: MAAN

South of Deran the main line soon leaves the richer corn land and enters an upland, undulating country, the land of Bashan, producing abundant grazing in the spring. At that season troops of gazelle roam about the country, and the Bedouin, with vast herds of camels, are found close to the line.

The landscape gets bleaker as the train moves south. The mountains of Moab are passed some distance to the west, and the track is laid far out in the desert, where the valleys are wide and easy to cross, and before they deepen into narrow ravines as they enter the mountains.

The old pilgrim route is followed very closely throughout, and at the stations the stone cisterns and reservoirs, to provide a supply of water to the pilgrims are noticed. Water becomes very scarce; in a few places wells have been dug and water is raised by wind-pumps. For some reason boring for artesian wells does not seem to have been tried. One attempt was made in rocky ground, and when the drills broke no further attempts were made.

As the line approaches Maan an extremely desolate country is traversed. Low ranges appear to the east, apparently of sandstone or limestone formation, although the ground is strewn thickly with black fragments of obsidian along some sections of the line. The ravines now trend eastward, to lose themselves in a wide depression in that direction, as shown in the recent maps of this country by Prof. Alois Musil. Maan is the first point since Amman where water is procurable in any quantity, either from springs in the small town itself or from wells at the railroad station. The place is a large railroad center, with several stone buildings for officials, a small shop for temporary repairs, a hospital, and quite a good hotel—a substantial building, rather small in size. The small town, containing some good stone and mud houses, is not visible from the railroad, but lies beyond a hill nearly a mile off. Two copious springs supply the necessary water.

Date palms are reared; small gardens with various kinds of fruit trees and a few fields of corn are visible, but from a little distance the place is little else than a drab patch on a gray landscape. Its principal distinction is its proximity to the rocky city of Petra, a ride of some eight hours to the west among the Moab hills. The climate of Maan is invigorating, both in winter and summer, as the place stands 3,525 feet above sea-level, surrounded by the dry, invigorating air of the desert.

The principal drawbacks are the severe dust storms. Rain is not uncommon in the spring and then a tinge of green spreads over the landscape. The ancient fortress of Petra and now Maan owe their importance as standing at the gate of Arabia, and forming the last outpost of Syria and western civilization before the long, dreary stages of the northern Arabian journey.

For countless ages—long before the present pilgrimages—this was the route by which the gold, frankincense, and Arabian products found their way into Syria; but the Suez canal and steamer transport by the Red sea seem to have abolished all, or almost all, trade prospects, and only the pilgrims remain.

On leaving Maan it may inded be said that all hope of dividend is left behind and the line enters a spirit world without towns or even inhabitants. The stages south of Maan, the old pilgrim route, were the most desolate of all, and the way was always strewn by dead and dying camels as the caravan toiled along. The line crosses a constant succession of small wadis.

Some 50 miles south of Maan comes the most remarkable change in the landscape ahd the veritable gate of Arabia and the home of the genie is at last reached. The line arrives quite suddenly at the edge of the curious escarpment known as the Batn-el-Ghrul, or the Hollow of the Genie.

From the station of Batn-el-Ghrul, at the top of the descent, the traveler can walk to the edge of the cliff and take in the immense extent of view which unfolds itself to the south. The escarpment is visible for some 20 miles to the east, and is a sheer cliff without, it is said, a single passage of descent. For some 15 miles to the west, also, the escarpment is fairly well defined, until it merges in the high ranges overlooking the Gulf of Akaba. The pilgrim route follows the descent close alongside the line and is from 3,207 feet at the summit to 3,278 at the foot of the escarpment, or 329 feet altogether.

The view from the summit is extremely striking and comprises a great inland depression, walled in by a continuation of the escarpment on the east, and glowing throughout in the most brilliant and striking colors. The prevailing note is bright red and yellow, changing to violet, purple and black, so that every tint except green seems to be supplied. The escarpment is of sandstone, which seems to have worn away in some places to sand-drift of all colors, but principally red and yellow. The spurs of the Telesh-Shahim, which run out parallel to the line, are covered with glistening black rocks, at first sight volcanic, but, as I was told by an engineer, they were really of sandstone blackened by the intense heat of the sun. The depression extends south for a distance of about 120 miles. In this clear, dry air every feature is visible. Inquiries regarding the country to the east gave it as an almost waterless region, although a route does exist from Maan to Jauf along which some scanty wells can be found. Towards the Red sea the district is said to contain a few villages, and a sufficient supply of water from small springs.

An endless series of beautiful mirages unfold themselves as the train toils slowly along these two lines of steel leading through an endless expanse of sand and rocks, varied with an occasional volcanic outcrop raising black-topped hills.

At Tebuk, 430 miles from Damascus, is the first oasis of any size, and here a depot has been formed, at which the railroad can recoup itself before another long strentch of nearly waterless desert is entered and the next depot at El Ula reached. A group of buildings for the employes, a small repairing shop, and a hospital with 60 beds form the principal part of the depot.

Tebuk consists of a group of date palms about a half a mile square, deriving water from a large spring and watched over by another of the masonry forts which mark a pilgrim station. Altogether there were about 60 mud houses, with a few walled gardens belonging to the permanent inhabitants of Tebuk. All that were seen were of a distinctly negroid type, different from the nomad Bedouin. The surrounding country is but sparsely inhabited by Arabs.

Besides date palms, there are in the gardens a few lemon trees and pomegranates, and outside are some few fields of wheat, cultivated principally as green fodder. The Italian engineer in charge of this section had managed to make a garden in the sand, where by means of irrigation he grew most kinds of European vegetables, but none of the inhabitants seemed inclined to copy his example.

It seems certain that Mohammed visited Tebuk in his earlier wanderings, and tradition refers to Jebel Sherora as the Pulpit of the Prophet, probably from its commanding position overlooking all the surrounding country.

The rainfall in this country is extremely capricious, and perhaps two or even three years may elapse before there is any appreciable fall here, although at Maan there appears to be always some rain in the spring.

Of animal life there appears to be very little. An antelope, which the Turks call a wild cow, but which looks to be oryx beatrix, is to be found in this district, but only in small numbers. The large troops of gazelle seen north of Maan do not roam here. It is said that the ostrich is occasionally found, and the skin of one specimen is preserved in Maan station.

The desert air is extremely dry and clear, always invigorating, and even the great heat in summer is not as insupportable as in a damper climate, where the thermometer is probably lower. Climate has without doubt a great effect on the human character and intellect, and the nervous, high-strung temperament of the Arab is to a great extent the creation of his environment of desert, with its splendid mirages to fire the imagination and sparkling air to keep the nerves always alert.

South of Tebuk want of water is again a great difficulty, and the small posts have to be supplied daily from the train.

At Medain-Salih the valley widens a little, and here are found some rock-cut tombs similar to those at Petra, but far fewer and less ornate. Traces of a town exist, but there is nothing now visible except the usual fort of the pilgrim. Here again, as well as at Tebuk, the site would seem a favorable one for trying artesian wells, but no attempts have been made to prove their success or otherwise.

The permanent way has been laid throughout by Turkish soldiers, but the station buildings, all of very solid masonry, as well as bridges and culverts, of which there are a great number, have been constructed mostly by Italian workmen, with some Greeks and Montenegrins. As many as three or four hundred Italian workmen were employed at one time on the works near Tebuk, and so little did fanaticism come into play that they built the fine new mosque at Tebuk. Subsequently they instructed some Turkish engineers, who continued the work from El Ula to the Holy City itself.

It is difficult to think of this railroad becoming a great highway or developing any great trade with Central Arabia, as the section from Maan to Medina traverses an unproductive country without possibility of development, and the interior of Arabia has no surplus products to dispose of. In any case, when the line reaches the sea, at Sherm Rabigh, it is probable that any trade, either export or import, to Medina or Mecca will pass through that port in preference to the long land journey. The following summary of distances shows the extent of the line:

Damascus to Maan	285 miles
Damascus to Tebuk	430 miles
Damascus to El Ula	609 miles
Damascus to Medina	820 miles
Damascus to Mecca	1097 miles

The gauge of the line is the somewhat curious one of 1.05 meter (3 feet 5¼ inches), which was necessary, when the line was first commenced, to correspond with the gauge of the Beirut-Damascus line, over which the rolling stock had to be brought. The branch to the Mediterranean, at Haifa, was constructed subsequently. The rails were supplied by the American Steel Trust, by a French firm domiciled in Russia, and by the firm of Cockerill, in Belgium.

The engineers in charge of sections were also of various nationalities—French, Poles, Hungarians, etc.—while the guiding spirit in the construction has been Meissner Pasha, a very able German engineer. But besides these the general direction has been under Marshal Kiazim Pasha, to whom the greatest credit is due in bringing the line successfully into Medina, and to Hajji Mukhtar Bey, a brilliant Turkish engineer, who has absorbed all modern methods of construction, and completed the last section into Medina without European assistance.

In conclusion, it is difficult which to admire the most, this far-reaching conception of his majesty the sultan—to build the line and thus to further the interests of his religion and bind together the outlying portions of his empire—or the silent, unswerving devotion of the Turkish soldier who has carried the matter to a conclusion, and who watches without complaint over miles of line through a country almost without water or inhabitants.

TAKE CARE OF GOOD HEALTH

Mistake Most People Make Is in Waiting for Bad to Come and Then Coddling It.

If we would take as good care of our good health as we do of our bad health we would have more of the former and less of the latter. We set our good health down in a draft and let it get its feet wet; we infringe on its sleep time and gorge it with unsuitable food at irregular hours. We load it with nerve-racking cares and duties, and reply to its frantic appeals for rest with, "You haven't time." We squeeze it with clothing; we distract its ears with noise and its lungs with bad air. But we put our bad health in a quiet room, on a soft couch. We robe it in a comfortable gown; we give it pure air at stated intervals; we put ice on its head and hot water at its feet; we feed it with food convenient for it. We take away all care and responsibility; we give it a soothing draught to rest it; and we pay a doctor two dollars to come and leave it a scrap of paper and say that it will better to-morrow. One might think we preferred bad health to good health. —From an article in Good Health.

Settling a Relationship

By E. DE LANCEY PIERSON

(Copyright, by J. B. Lippincott Co.)

Walking my horse up a steep road in the Cumberlands one afternoon I heard a sound like a tin-shop rolling down the mountain side. The racket seemed to proceed from an unoffending looking hut which crowned a knoll on my right. Seated about the doorway were ranged some dozen dogs of uncertain breeds, watching the entrance with rapt attention.

Presently a female figure came shooting out of the interior and landed among them with a resounding thump that scattered them in all directions. She was on her feet in a moment, none the worse for her plunge, and disappeared into the gaping doorway closely followed by a lop-eared hound who seemed to have taken great interest in her acrobatics.

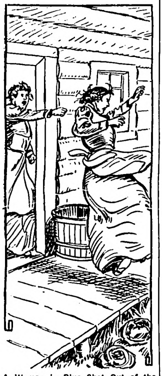
Having always enjoyed a circus since boyhood, I waited for the next number on the program. I had not long to wait before a woman in blue shut out of the shack, and descended like an unwieldy bird in the midst of a damp cabbage bed. Being a woman of weight, it was some time before she could extricate herself from her uncomfortable position. She rushed into the house again, and the fusillade of tinware was renewed.

"Who's ahead, stranger?" asked a drawling voice at my elbow.

I turned to confront a lanky mountaineer "chawing" a straw thoughtfully. He seemed about seven feet high and was bearded to the eyes. His brown jeans clothes were covered with grass and mud.

"What seems to be the trouble?" I asked.

"Oh, them women critters has had a leetle dif'rence of 'pinion 'bout a p'int 'o law. Be'n at it now some days and hain't got things evened up yit. Mighty hefty handed them fieldmales"—with a glow of admiration. "Yisteddy a'ternoon it looked mighty dubersome fur Jane (her what's in pink), but along to'ds night Mirandy (her what's in blue) got in a lick with a hoe handle that come near puttin' Jane out of the race."



A Woman in Blue Shot Out of the Shack.

"You seem very well acquainted with these ladies," I ventured.

"Stranger"—solemnly—"tha' ain't none in these parts as knows 'em better, or wuss, for that matter. That 'ere lady with the peaked face an' retirin' nose claims ter be my lawful wife."

"And the other?"

"She puts in claim for the same persition."

"Why, you surely didn't marry both of them, did you?"

"I ken't egzactly say whuther I did or not, but I'll know when things gits straightened out what's the reel article. Ain't got much ch'ice anyway. Ye see, a feller needs a heavy-handed partner in these parts whar' there's so many fieldmales roamin' 'round loose. I'm that much a gent that ef some likely lady come a mosein' 'round my shack settin' up a relationship, I ain't goin' ter contradict her. There never was sich a distreec' for wanderin' womens what's lost their men in the shuffle, and they hain't allus pertic'ler 'bout identifyin' 'em nuther. Here was me livin' ca'am like, when Mirandy breaks in an' claims 'at she's the on'y 'riginal Mrs. Podgrass. This onexpected play is embarrassin' some. Jane 'lows that thor' hain't goin' ter be no back numbers rung in onter her dermestic bliss."

"But you ought to know if you married the other woman?"

He rubbed his long red nose for a moment thoughtfully.

"It mought be that 'fore I was right growed and livin' up Tar creek way I was j'ined to that short-horn in blue, but it's clean slipped my mem'ry, an' I hain't goin' ter accept every lady what makes a play for a share of my dermestic bliss. I'll jest leave them ladies to settle the question 'mongst themselves."

Just then a noise from the shack diverted attention. "Her what's in blue" plunged out of the cabin as if propelled from behind. She began to exchange compliments with "Her what's in pink," who stood defiantly in the doorway. Victory evidently had crowned the latter, for the woman in blue turned at last and disappeared in the woods.

"Ah knowed it! Ah knowed it!" exclaimed the mountaineer, slapping his thigh. "I allus said 'at Jane were the beatenest critter ter argify, an' after gittin' sich a swat with a hoe handle, too," and he laughed like the howl of a wolf. "Stranger, ef ye'll gimme one o' them long cigars I'll lope over to the shack an' git me a mess o' hawg meat. I hain't sot teeth in nuthin' but raw cabbage sence them women was clawin' roun' the homestead, and I'm a mite onsettled in my innards."

I handed him a cigar, which he chewed on with ponderous jaws. He was evidently eager to go and embrace the victor.

"I'd ax ye to j'ine us, on'y I take it things is consid'able mixed inside. A leetle onpleasantness stirs things roun' permiscu's like." I assured him I must press on that night.

"Well, it is dangerous for a lone man here layin' roun' loose. Fust thing ye know, some ornery fieldmale might light on ye an' make out ye'd lef' her with seven chillun onpervided fer sence the war. What kin a feller do when a lady puts up sich a game on him? I tell ye this here subjec' of absent-minded relations is playin' the mischief with the kentry," and he disappeared in the bushes.

SCHOOL OF THE ROMANTICS

Attitude Greatly Exaggerated by Some of the Most Famous of French Writers.

Ostensibly the romantics were chiefly concerned with the breaking down of the old rule which fettered literary and dramatic composition, making meters more elastic and demanding more latitude in the choice of subjects. They really differ from their predecessors in making literature more subjective, in attaching more importance to their own personalities, experiences and "sensibilities," in more openly exploiting the secrets of their souls, in arranging limelight effects and posturing in the center of the stage. One or two of them, indeed, like Alfred de Vigny, were too proud to care to make themselves conspicuous in this way; one or two, like Prosper Merimee, were too cynical. But their general tendency was to turn on the limelight, strike attitudes and call upon the world to behold and admire them, not for what they had done, but for what they were.

The attitudes struck by some of them—by Dumas, for instance—were more or less intentionally grotesque; but the more usual intention was to appear either sentimental or sublime. Even Sante-Beuve aspired to be sentimental, though circumstances were against him, for he was ugly and undistinguished. Victor Hugo never tired of reminding his admirers (untruly) that Chauteaubriand had saluted him as "sublime child," while the pioneers of romanticism were, if possible, even more insistent in their self-conscious egoism. It was said of Chauteaubriand that he would be content to starve in a garret, provided that the garret were in a theater; and Lamartin had no scruple in formulating his unfavorable opinion of any one whom his personality failed to impress. Of a certain stranger who neither blushed nor shrank into his shoes when introduced to him he remarked: "I predict no good of that young man. He was unmoved in my presence." That surely is the acme of egoism—inoffensive, because unsurpassable. One cannot help applauding the sentiment if only because Lamartine, in uttering it, robbed even Chateaubriand of his laurels.

Camel a Delicate Beast.

Contrary to the widespread but erroneous opinion the camel is a very delicate animal. A camel that has worked 15 days in succession needs a month's pasturage to recuperate. It is liable to a host of ailments and accidents. When a caravan crosses a sebkha, or dry salt lake, it is rare that some of the animals do not break a leg. If the fracture is in the upper part of the limb there is nothing for it but to slaughter the animal and retail its flesh as butcher's meat.

If the lower part of the limb has been inured the bone is set and held in position by means of splints made of palm branches, which are bound with small cords. If no complications ensue at the end of the month the fracture is reduced. When it is a case of simple dislocation the injured part is cauterized with a red hot iron, then coated with clay and bandaged with a strip of cloth. Fifteen days afterwards the animal is generally cured.

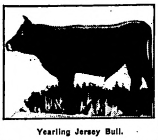
SELECTION OF DAIRY CATTLE

Only Safe Way Is to Get a Good Bull and Raise Heifer Calves for Home Use.

The practice of buying cows on the market to use in the dairy is a poor business. Ordinary, cows of this kind are being sold because they are no good, and it is usually like throwing money away to invest it in these animals. Why do people continue to buy and sell such cows? The only safe and sane way is to get a good bull and raise the best heifer calves for home use, and if these calves are raised right your profit will be double over the method of buying "second-handed" cows. The method of buying ordinary cows on the market is like buying lottery tickets; you may win but the chances are a hundred to one that you will lose.



Yearling Jersey Bull.

A great many dairymen neglect their dry cows, and do not allow them even a maintenance ration. About all that some dry cows get is the free run of a straw stack, which is not sufficient. Just how much feed a dry cow should have depends largely upon her condition. She should have a little food, rich in protein, such as oil meal, wheat bran or brewers' grains. One or two pounds of such grain along with some silage and pea hay or soja beans hay, will make a good ration for a cow in medium flesh. A pregnant cow should have plenty of nourishment, and should be in fairly good flesh when she colors. This enables her to start off with a good flow of milk, and will always do better during the whole period.

REMARKABLE MILK PRODUCER

This Cow, Albino Second, Holstein-Friesian, Made Record That Has Never Been Equaled.

The Orchard and Farm describes and illustrates what it terms the most remarkable cow that ever lived. This cow, Albino Second, is a Holstein-Friesian. She made as a two-year-old a record, commencing at 26 months, of 18,434 pounds of milk in a year—a record that has never been equaled by any other cow of any breed. One of the most remarkable facts regarding this record is that during the thirteenth month after calving she gave a larger amount of milk than she did the first month. On the fourteenth month after calving she made 13 pounds 14⅞ ounces of butter in a week. She had her second calf as a three-year-old without having been dry, and made a butter record of 25 pounds, 14¼ ounces in a week, and 106 pounds 14 ounces in 30 days. The comment on this cow closes by stating that this wonderful cow is dead, the result of overfeeding on green rye, and her only descendant is a bull named Netherland Monk.

DAIRY NOTES.

Don't try to make a cow give down her milk with a shovel or club.

In feeding skim milk to calves give them milk which has been separated as soon as possible after milking and before bacteria have had time to multiply. The cleaner the milk and drinking vessels the less chances for trouble.

Let the skim milk calf take nourishment from the cow for two or three days, so that it may get a good start in life. The first milk from the cow, warm and sweet from the udder, is just the thing for the digestive organs of the infant animal.

When calves acquire looseness of the bowels reduce the amount of milk, or even skip a feed. When the calf begins to mend the feed may be gradually increased. Clean and well-lighted stalls will reduce chances for infection of the young animals.

Dairy cows should be kept clean, particularly the udders. Before milking the udder should be rubbed with a damp cloth, but not too wet. This will prevent any dirt falling into the milk. Cattle soon get accustomed to being cleaned and appreciate it.

The first milk after the cow freshens contains much more protein and ash than afterwards. Nature provides these to loosen and clean out the digestive system and to give the calf a good start in life.

New Hair Grown by Cuticura.

"About two years ago I was troubled with my head being scaly. Shortly after that I had an attack of typhoid fever and I was out of the hospital possibly two months when I first noticed the loss of hair, my scalp being still scaly. I started to use dandruff cures to no effect whatever. I had actually lost hope of saving any hair at all. I could brush it off my coat by the handful. I was afraid to comb it. But after using two cakes of Cuticura Soap and nearly a box of Cuticura Ointment, the change was surprising. My scalp is now clear and healthy as could be and my hair thicker than ever, whereas I had my mind made up to be bald. W. F. Steese, 5812 Broad St., Pittsburg, Penn., May 7 and 21, 1908."

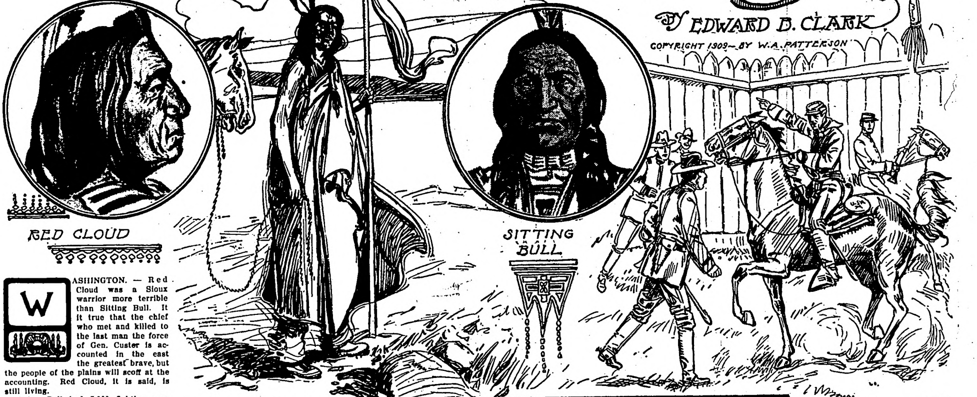
RED CLOUD—MOST TERRIBLE OF SIOUX WARRIORS

BY EDWARD B. CLARK

COPYRIGHT 1909—BY W. A. PATTERSON



WASHINGTON. — Red Cloud was a Sioux warrior more terrible than Sitting Bull. It it true that the chief who met and killed to the last man the force of Gen. Custer is accounted in the east the greatest brave, but the people of the plains will scoff at the accounting. Red Cloud, it is said, is still living.

Sitting Bull had 5,000 fighting men with him when he met the Seventh cavalry under the "Yellow-haired Chief," who rode into the valley of death with less than three hundred following troopers. It is the custom of the whites to speak of every battle with the reds in which the pale face loss was severe as a massacre. The Custer affair was a massacre, but it was one of the few fights in which the whites were defeated which rightly could be so called.

Red Cloud's name is suggestive of the warrior, and in the years that are gone he made its significance terrible. With his braves he swept the settlements and gave battle to the soldiery, rarely giving heed to the odds that might be against him.

Red Cloud was a Sioux of the pure blood. There were always men of the tribe who said that Sitting Bull had a trace of white in him, and to the full-blood this was the equivalent of discrediting him with a "streak of yellow." But this was only the Indian way of looking at it and Sitting Bull probably never showed a coward's face to any foe, no matter what may be the opinion of him as a plainsman general.

In his old age Red Cloud is said to be an object of pity, but it was a different story in the earlier days, when his arm was strong and his heart was vengeful. Almost immediately after the civil war Red Cloud met in battle the field-tried heroes of that conflict and they found in him a foe worthy of their skill and steel.

Mineral wealth had been discovered in Montana and the rush of prospectors and settlers made it necessary for the government to begin the erection of military posts along the trail leading over the prairies to the mines. On the trail to the Powder river was built Fort Phil Kearney. While the troops ordered to the new post were on the march overland, a scout came riding in to the column as if he had death at his heels. Col. Fetterman was in command, and after a hurried talk with the scout the two rode forward, leaving the column at a halt. Officer and scout skirted a patch of timber and came to the banks of a small prairie stream from which the view was unbroken for miles. To the front and about 600 yards distant they saw a solitary Sioux warrior standing on the plain with his spear thrust into the ground at his side, while from the end of the weapon's handle fluttered a bit of colored cloth. It needed but little frontier knowledge to make interpretation of that signal easy. It was the Sioux sign of warning that there must be no trespassing on the lands over which they held dominion.

Warning Is Spurned.

Red Cloud, the chief, had ordered the warrior to display what was at once a notice and a menace, and later he took a terrible vengeance because his warning had been spurned.

Col. Fetterman rode back to his command, knowing well what the signal of the planted spear meant, but, soldier like, fully determined to disregard its conveyed threat. He pushed ahead with his men, throwing out scouts to feel the way. The Indian sentinel had vanished, but he had left his spear with its pennant of cloth to stand as a forbidding sign. Not another Sioux was seen on the march to the new post, but the scouts knew that Red Cloud was not far off and was biding his time.

A few hours after the occupation of the fort a detail of soldiers was sent out with a small wagon train to cut and to bring in needed timber. Two hours later a courier rode in and had barely time to tell his story before he sank into unconsciousness from the pain of his wounds. The timber detail was surrounded by Sioux and was in imminent danger of death.

In the fort were many women and children, the wives and sons and daughters of the officers and enlisted men. Col. Fetterman knew that he must leave a strong guard for the protection of the post, for the attack on the timber party might be but a diversion to draw away the troops, and so, taking but 50 men with him, the commanding officer rode out to the rescue of the surrounded soldiers. Not one man of the gallant band ever rode back.

That Fetterman and his men exacted a heavy price for their lives goes without saying, but how many of the savage followers of Red Cloud fell on that day no man ever knew nor will man ever know unless the chief in the hour of his dotage may one day babble the tale.

To the memory of Fetterman a fort bearing his name rose in the wilderness, but even the remembrance of the memorial is now passing away. News of the killing of the troops that had gone to the aid of their fellows only to die was sent to the nearest garrison by courier, who made his way through the hostile country with peril besetting every hoof stroke on the path. He eluded Red Cloud only by matching cunning against cunning, and the white craft won over the red.

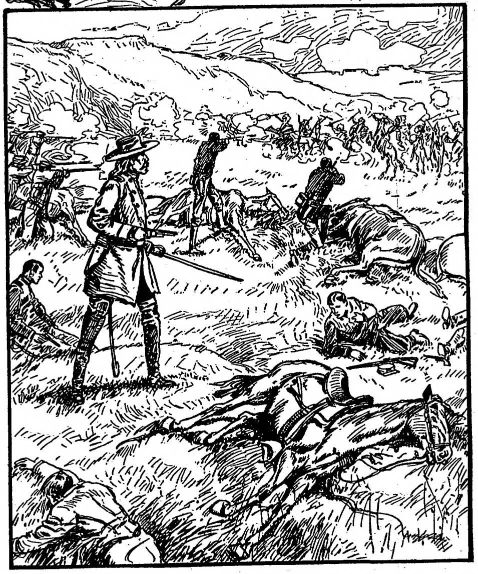
Relief reached the post, but by this time the whole Sioux nation had declared for war and the northwest was aflame, nor did the fires of conflict kindled by Red Cloud, die out for more than a score of years, the last flicker of the flame lighting the battle field of "The Mission," near Pine Ridge, S. D., in the year 1891.

Red Cloud, at the agency near the scene of the last fight, saw the wounded brought in from the field. He had seen the beginning of the great war and he was the witness of its end.

Reno's Gallant Fight.

While Sitting Bull with his 5,000 warriors was engaged in the annihilation of Gen. Custer and his devoted following of troopers, in June, 1876, Maj. Reno's squadron of the Seventh cavalry was battling with a band of Sioux not many miles away in the country of the Little Big Horn.

The "Custer massacre" overshadowed all the other Indian fights which took place in that red month, and thus it is that but little is known outside the circles of the army about the gallant fight which the unfortunate Reno and his men put up that day against the swarming hordes of savages.



After it was known that Custer and his command had been killed there was criticism of Major Reno for not pushing forward to Custer's assistance. The major had been given orders to take another trail, and when he felt the shaft of criticism he demanded that a court of inquiry be convened to pass upon his conduct. The court met, heard the evidence and found him blameless.

Later in his army life Reno, a man of tried courage, committed indiscretions which resulted in a court-martial and a sentence of dismissal from the army in which he had served in peace and in war for years.

There was an incident in connection with Reno's fight with the reds nearly 30 years ago concerning which the only facts set down in army history are that for a specific act of gallantry on that field of battle Sergt. Richard P. Hanley was awarded a medal of honor. The noncommissioned officer received his decoration for riding a mule, a dangerous proceeding at almost any time, but a proceeding on that day of battle so precarious that neither Hanley nor his comrades believed when the ride began that it could end in anything but death.

Reno found himself confronted by a tremendous force of Indians. The fight that ensued was one of the fiercest ever fought on the plains. A charge made by a part of Reno's command, a charge that literally led the troopers into the jaws of death, turned the tide of defeat, though a score of officers and men gave up their lives that victory might come.

The men in Reno's command knew that they were a match for five times their number of savages, but they were short of ammunition and every time that the Sioux were driven away they returned again to the assault, and every assault cost the troopers dear in powder and lead.

Finally all the ammunition in the outfit with the exception of that which the men carried in their belts was on the back of a huge, bad-tempered Missouri mule, chosen for the job of cartridge carrier because of his prodigious proportions and his unflagging energy.

Daring Deed of a Trooper.

The mule was with the pack train to the right and rear of the squadron, which was lying along the edge of a wood with its face toward the enemy. A Sioux warrior who was no sharpshooter sent a bullet which might have been aimed at the noonday sun. Probably before it came to earth it tore a fragment out of a cloud, but on its way to the ground it "creased" the ammunition-bearing mule, which instantly broke loose and, maddened by pain and fright, went tearing through the wood, knocking down a trooper who attempted to stay its course, and then made straight for the outlying masses of the enemy.

When the flying mule had reached a point about a hundred yards distant from where the feathered heads of the reds were showing, it stopped short and, forgetting its pain, began to graze on the bunch grass.

On the back of that mule was the ammunition upon which depended the troopers' salvation. In order to reach the animal any man brave enough to make the attempt must needs cross an open plain swept by a thousand rifles.

The officers consulted and a desperate plan for the recapture of the mule was under discussion. Suddenly one of the enlisted men called attention to a movement in the grass far over to the right. In a moment the head of a white man was seen. It was a trooper who was crawling slowly toward the stampeded animal.

Word was passed swiftly down the line, and volley after volley was directed at the Sioux to keep their attention away from the mule and from the soldier who was making his way toward it. The trooper crawled on and on. He was close to the savage line and discovery meant death. He reached a point within 25 yards of the grazing animal, then suddenly stood up, bolted forward and vaulted on to the mule's back.

Digging his spurs deep into the animal's side, Sergt. Hanley, for he was the trooper who had dared death to save the ammunition, started the animal back on a run toward the squadron. There was wild yelling from a thousand red throats. Hundreds of rifles were emptied at the mule and its dauntless rider.

Straight into the lines Hanley rode unhurt. He had taken one chance in a thousand and had won out.

The army mule lived, but it did not escape unscathed, as did Hanley. As a man in the fight said afterward: "That mule came back with as much lead in his hide as he had in his pack."

CAREER OF "BABE" CLARKE.

In the year 1880 there reported at the United States Military Academy as a candidate for admission a Louisiana boy, who was just 17 years old, but who looked to be three years younger. His name was Powhatan H. Clarke. No cadet is admitted to the academy who has not rounded out 17 years of life.

Clarke was called "Babe" by his classmates because he was the youngest among them. The oldest member of the class is dubbed "Dad." This has been the custom of the class from time immemorial and the saddling of the word of infancy upon the cadet implies nothing of weakness of body or of character.

One day at Sunday morning inspection the tactical officer told "Babe" that he must shave and the boy blushed like a holly berry. There was fun in camp that day, for with the advent of the razor into his kit "Babe" had passed from childhood.

There was a cadet at the academy who had some grievance against "Babe," It must have been imaginary, for the Louisiana boy was in demeanor peace and good nature to all the world. Clarke was challenged to a fight; the challenger outweighed him 20 pounds, but the boy refused to let one of his classmates take the burden of battle on himself and he fought the heavier cadet and thrashed him beautifully.

Young Clarke proved his pluck on that day. Later he gave an exhibition of heroism. He was a southerner, with a southerner's prejudice against the negroes, but upon graduation from the academy in 1884 he went into a black regiment, the Tenth cavalry. He was just 21 years of age, the youngest second lieutenant in the army of the United States. He was ordered to Arizona and before he had been at his post a month he was sent into the field against hostile Apaches. With a squad of men he was directed by his troop commander to detach himself from the main body for the purpose of making a reconnoissance into a part of the country that was all rock and sand. While riding with his men across the sandy waste beyond which rose the rocks, a crashing volley met his command. Tha duty sergeant was shot through both hips and he fell from his horse to the ground.

Clarke knew that another volley would crash almost instantly and he knew also that he was greatly outnumbered. Furthermore, a mounted charge was impossible.

Clarke ordered his men to fall back to shelter, but he stayed on the field. He jumped from his horse to the ground and attempted to lift the wounded trooper, who was a heavy man, to the saddle. His strength was equal to the task, but the man was so injured he could not retain his seat and in his condition Clarke found that it would be impossible to hold him on the back of his mount.

He struck his horse on the flank with the palm of his hand and sent him trotting back to the troopers who, under orders, had retreated. Then the lieutenant put himself between the Indians and the wounded sergeant, prepared for an effort, and raised the black man to his shoulder. The Apaches broke loose with another volley. Clark's blouse was pierced twice and the sand was kicked up spitefully about his knees, but he was unhurt. He staggered back over the yielding sand, while the bullets spat about him.

Back through the death-beset way Clarke carried the black sergeant, shielding him as much as it was in his power with his own body while he toiled along. Finally he reached shelter and with his men he made a detour, attacked the Apaches in flank and sent them scattering.

The black sergeant is still living, but the white lieutenant who saved him is dead.

He lost his life while swimming in the Snake river country. He had struck a rock in diving. The blow in itself might not have killed him, but he was drowned, while on the bank stood the troopers for one of whose black comrades Powhatan H. Clarke had once dared death in the Arizona desert.

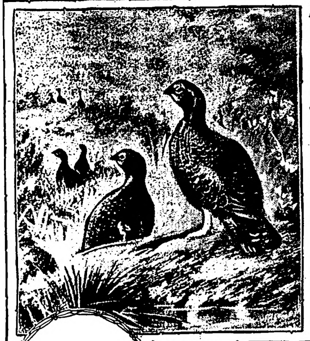
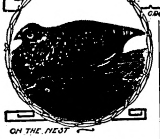
DISEASE OF THE GROUSE



GROUSE GREETING SUNRISE ON THE MOORS



ON THE NEST

ONE of the most experienced writers on grouse affirms that this year there is a belt of grouse disease spreading, if not regularly, in patches, from the Lammermuirs and Northumberland right across the border counties from east to west. "As always happens," he observes, "when disease shows itself, some moors in an affected belt seem to escape. This is no great assistance to them, for even if they have large stocks, which is not likely, the grouse will distribute themselves and occupy vacant sites on other moors when spring and breeding start again, so that escaping moors in disease belts rarely avoid reduction of stocks to the level, or nearly to the level, of the disease-afflicted moors." It well be seen, therefore, that the causes of grouse disease are matters which are of very great importance, and call for further light from the grouse disease inquiry, the committee of which began its labors in 1905.

The literature of grouse disease may almost be characterized as voluminous, especially if we include the ceaseless flow of contributions to the newspapers by naturalists and sportsmen relative to the dissemination of the malady.

Some forty years ago Dr. Cobbold enunciated that the main cause of mortality among the birds was the mischief induced in the intestines by a nematode worm. In 1874 Dr. R. Farquharson, writing to the Lancet, expressed the opinion that the disease in its acute form was an infectious fever, of epidemic incidence, a view which received considerable support. New and fruitful lines of inquiry were developed by Dr. E. Klein, F. R. S., who in 1892 published a monograph, the outcome of five years' study, detailing the symptoms, pathology and bacteriology of grouse disease. He found that the chief change in its course resulted from acute congestion of one or both lungs of the afflicted bird. This congestion was marked apparently in post mortem examinations and, in Klein's opinion, it was clear that as in acute congestion of the lung in man and animals, so also in the grouse under these conditions fever must be a prominent symptom.

Lord Lovat became chairman of a grouse disease inquiry which was appointed by Lord Onslow in 1905, but which, as is not unusual when scientific work is launched in Great Britain, was expected to defray the cost of its investigations by private subscriptions. Last year it issued an interim report, which has not yet received the imprimatur of being made a government publication, and is, consequently, a rather rare document. From one point of view the committee has been decidedly unlucky in that during the period of its investigations no cases of the acute form of the disease, or that form in which the disease runs like a fire through the heather, have come under notice. The form they have investigated is what may be called the chronic, or endemic, form of the disease, which appears to be a wasting and usually fatal illness. In the earlier stages the bird is less strong on the wing than ordinarily, and changes its station from the heather to the green ground. In the later stages the power of flight is lost, the internal congestion becomes more acute, and the microscopic parasites swarm inside the birds. Loss of weight makes itself daily more noticeable, and the bird mopes about the banks of the stream till death puts an end to its sufferings. Among the parasites the microscopic threadworm, Trichnostrongylus gracilis, is regarded by Dr. A. E. Shipley, F. R. S., who is the chief authority in the present band of investigators, as the real offender, and he has made valuable contributions to the knowledge of its life history. Although great caution is displayed by Dr. Shipley in giving any statement as final, it seems fairly well established that, owing to some earlier cause which reduces the bird's vitality and powers of resistance, these parasites are able to develop to such an abnormal extent that the bird succumbs to their attacks.

This brings us to the predisposing causes which make a grouse unable to resist the chronic wasting form of illness. Is it possible that Prof. Klein was right and that a form of pneumonia exists among the birds, which, even if it does not carry them off, predisposes them to injury from the wasting form of the disease? It cannot be said that in the interim reports of the committee of inquiry any great leaning to this view is to be discovered. During 1905, 1906 and 1907 the very large number of field observers, amounting to several hundreds, associated with the committee did not detect one instance of the acute pneumonic form of the disease, and Mr. Wilson has observed that some of the symptoms relied on by Prof. Klein in his published monograph are not conclusive evidence of its existence. It seems, therefore, that the committee are rather reluctant on the one hand to admit Klein's grouse-pneumonia, and yet are at a loss to explain why otherwise it is that the birds become susceptible to the wasting sickness.

Within the last few days the Zoological society of London has issued a series of papers by Dr. A. E. Shipley on the parasitic organisms of which the grouse is host. In these papers the value to be attached to Dr. Cobbold's early observations is fully apparent. The larvae of the threadworms which prey upon the red grouse exist in abundance in every square foot of heather, and no doubt is felt that under certain conditions —at present undetermined—the larvae reach the two important organs of the bird, the lungs and the liver. Referring to the extreme difficulty, in consequence of their microscopic dimensions, of finding the ova upon the heather, either on the stalks or in the buds (thought they exist in countless thousands), Dr. Shipley mentions a new and peculiarly successful method of examination, which he hit upon in the autumn of last year, whilst visiting at Beaufort castle. A handful of heather placed in a bottle is soaked in a little water for some hours; ultimately the sediment after suitable treatment is examined microscopically for larvae, and that with unvarying wealth of material. It is stated that the exact relations of the grouse-fly (Ornithomyia lagopodis) to the grouse is not known.

NEWS FROM the CAPITAL

Lacked Confidence in the Weather Man

FAIR WEATHER BUREAU

WASHINGTON.—There is not yet that absolute trust in the weather bureau that should exist, and if this were not true the loss in the recent West India hurricane, which came on schedule time, would have been much less. Ports in the storm district were warned of the approaching disturbances, and vessels in the extreme south Atlantic and Gulf of Mexico ports received advices to remain in harbor.

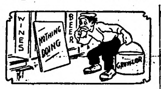
The storm apparently had its inception near the middle islands of the Lesser Antilles, and moved thence westward over the Caribbean sea. In accordance with the weather bureau warning much of the shipping was placed in safe harbor and not injured at all. The loss of life would have been much less in all probability had not the people who were warned disdained to heed the warning.

There are really a lot of right sensible people who believe that the weather bureau is something to laugh at and have fun over. And there are a lot of other people, notably United States senators, who while in Washington direct all the operations on their farms and ranches by the weather bureau reports. Early in the morning senators and representatives begin studying the weather bureau maps. If the reports of the weather from the section in which they live show that rain is impending in harvest time, a large force is ordered to work, by wire, and the manager told to hustle.

If hay is to be cut and the weather bureau reports say "storm," the hay is not cut, but by wire the manager of the farm or ranch is ordered to hold the "hands" for an emergency call in case the weather indications are brighter. Particularly is the weather map studied in the winter by western ranch owners.

Indeed, although not perfect by any means, the weather bureau prognostications have saved the people of the country millions of dollars a year, and would save them yet other millions if the people would but heed the warning. It is a common thing to say: "What does the morning paper say? Rain? Well, I will put my umbrella away. No rain to-day." Just the same, five out of seven times the rain comes.

Liquor Men to Reform Their Business



THE world do move. The liquor dealers of Washington are engaged in a reform as is a reform, say what you will or may. They propose to have liquor vended in the national capital in a perfectly ladylike way, and it please you the Retail Liquor Dealers' association is at the head of the reform.

Among the important features suggested as the future policy of the Reform Liquor Dealers' association are the strict observance of the regulations now in force by the excise board, the partial elimination of the "growler," nothing to be sold in this form to wagon drivers or other passers-by; the doing away with the free lunch, except a screened bowl of cheese and crackers, the free lunch being an unwarranted competition to regularly-licensed restaurants and cafes and at the same time calculated to be insanitary and a means of transmitting disease; the discontinuance of "cut prices" and brazen competition; the doing away with large signs, and the removal of all kegs piled up in front of saloons as an advertisement of the volume of business being done.

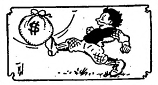
No liquor is to be sold to a female over the bars, nor in private upstairs rooms or hallways; objectionable characters or language around saloons will be placed under the ban. Men known to be habitual drinkers or those in any way under the influence of liquor will be refused.

Well, now, you know, all this might have been written by the W. C. T. U., and certainly it is a vindication of the hard work they have been doing for the betterment of large cities.

To stop the "rushing of the growler" and the serving of liquor to women will go a long way toward that reform which all good, public-spirited people have long desired.

There is to be an absolute closing of all saloons from Saturday night until opening time the next Monday morning.

Football Star Can Kick Money Bags Now



LEE McCLUNG, who played half back on the invincible Yale football team of 1891, has been selected by President Taft to succeed Charles H. Treat as treasurer of the United States. Mr. McClung, who is treasurer of Yale university, took up his work in Washington November 1.

Through his work at Yale Mr. McClung has been obliged to make New Haven his temporary residence, but his home is in Knoxville, Tenn. Besides doing important work in connection with the finances of Yale, Mr. McClung has had other valuable experiences in financial matters, having been connected with the Southern railway for a time and also other enterprises in his native state.

Mr. McClung was probably one of the greatest half backs in college football, playing on the Yale team at the same time as the famous Heffelfinger. It was largely due to the work of McClung and Heffelfinger that Yale went through the entire season of 1891 without being once scored against by a rival team.

Senators May Keep Themselves Clean

SENATE BATHS

WHEN congress convenes in Washington the first Monday in December begrimed and perspiring senators emerging from the toil and dust of the senate chamber will no longer be forced to hurry home to "wash up" for dinner. Instead they will hide their desheveled appearance in dark corridors and slip stealthily through the dusky subway to the $4,000,000 office building. Here baths, which rival those of millionaires' homes, are ready for the members of the upper law-making branch.

In order to encourage the senators in the cleanliness which tends to purity, the baths were made to exceed in elegance anything found in a senatorial home.

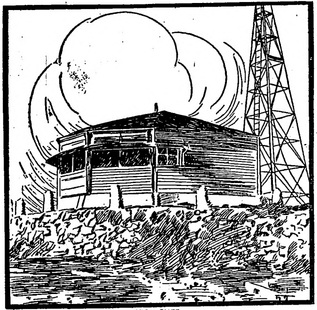
A large room was set apart on the first floor of the building, marble floored and wainscoted with the purest of white stone. Into sections of this room have been fitted the baths, shower baths, Turkish baths, needle baths and other facilities for cleanliness which invite and even entice.

Marble rooms, bound 'round with gilded steam pipes, beckon while the senatorial waistcoat and modest necktie are hung up on solid metal hooks fastened in marble walls.

In the rubbing rooms are two great marble slabs, supported upon handsomely carved bases. These are wide enough to accommodate the ample form of Senator Heyburn of Idaho, long enough for the tall Shively of Indiana, and bounded around by a forbidding ridge, which will keep from accidental fall the small and rotund form of Chamberlain of Oregon.

It is not to be charged because the elaborate bathing facilities are provided in the senate office building that senators have not bathed before.

THE KEEPERS OF GOLDEN GATE



HYSLOP'S STATION ON THE OCEAN CLIFF

WHEN the sailor nears land his real troubles commence. Strange as it may seem to the landsman, land is the sailor's greatest menace, especially when beset by fog. More wrecks are caused by strandings than by any other cause or by all other causes combined.

Hence the continual effort of governments to better their systems of lighthouses, fog signals and other aids to navigation.

San Francisco is one of the most admirably equipped seaports of the world in this respect, and numberless are the wearied mariners who heave a sigh of relief when the lights, first of the Farallones, then of Point Bonita and Fort Point, come in sight, are "picked up," as the sailor himself says, or, in case of thick weather, their fog signals heard. Glad, too, are tidings of a ship's arrival that are heralded by the lookout of the San Francisco Merchants' exchange stationed, day and night, in his little sentry box overlooking the Cliff house and Mile rock and the sea for miles beyond.

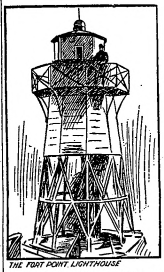
The keepers of the Fort Point light and of the Merchants' exchange signal station are interesting characters. They may well be termed the "keepers of the Golden gate."

For 30 years John Hyslop has been the lookout of the Merchants' exchange. He is to the port of today what old Telegraph hill was to the forty-niners. With the aid of his big telescope, a finely adjusted instrument costing thousands of dollars, Hyslop can sight a vessel far out at sea and classify and name her while she is yet miles away. He knows every liner, every steamer, every ship, every lumber carrier, every fishing boat, every schooner that passes his post. A look at a vessel's rigging is enough for him to identify her; and remember he is a landsman, or, lacking that, the sound of her whistle or note of bell. For 30 years he has trained his powerful telescope on the ships of 20 different countries.

"Jim" Rankin has been the lighthouse keeper at Fort Point for 35 years. His hair was brown when he first entered the government service and undertook the responsible task of warning vessels off the rockbound shores of the Golden gate and guiding them safely to the commodious anchorage within. He is now grizzled, but his eye is as keen and his nerves as steady and his devotion to duty as stern as a quarter of a century ago. In his period of service he has seen wondrous changes in the maritime life of San Francisco.

When a gale is on there is always an oil clad figure and a ruddy face under a lowered oilskin cap climbing the steps from the lighthouse tower to another one just opposite, where a flaring mouthed trumpet hangs over the rocks below. Every 30 minutes the big lamp must be visited. Every 30 minutes the big machine which blows breath into the steel and iron lungs of the hoarse voiced trumpet must be examined and tested that it may be ascertained if it is working to its full capacity. The duplicate machine which stands ready to take up the work should any part of its twin suddenly fail is kept in perfect condition by daily inspection; but it is seldom called on to perform extra duty.

Changes as great as in the topographical and architectural surroundings have been observed by both Hyslop and Rankin in the maritime and commercial conditions of San Francisco bay during their long terms of service. The decline in sailing tonnage and the increase of steam tonnage entering and leaving the port, the great expansion of Pacific ocean trade and many other events have taken place in the last three decades.



THE FORT POINT LIGHTHOUSE

Twenty big grain carrying vessels used to sail out the gate in a single week. At the present time there are not that number in a year. They have been replaced by the big freighters, each of which can carry as much grain as ten of the old-time sailing ships. On the China steamers a dozen passengers used to be registered as a fair list. A China steamer's passenger capacity is tested to the utmost to-day by lists running as high as 250 names. Perhaps a dozen sailing vessels pass through the gate in a month's time. Looking out over the bay in early days one could perceive 30 or 40 sail in a glance. Thirty years ago 1,400 tons was considered good carrying power for a sailing vessel; 3,000 tons carrying capacity is the recognized standard now. Three decades ago a 2,000 ton steamer was held a first rater, to-day anything smaller than 20,000 tons is hardly second class.

The displacement of the sailing vessels by steam propellers has about caused the towboat business to pass out of existence. When every vessel has a smokestack, towboats are no longer needed. Occasionally a big vessel will use one in docking, but the few towboats remaining are used mainly as fishing boats and are owned by two or three companies, who employ 50 men or more on the boats, which usually work in pairs. The great fishing nets, 200 and 300 feet long, are dragged through the water by being spread out between two of the boats, attached to each boat's stern. In this way fish are caught by the ton. The change from the familiar lateen sailed fishing boats, which used to be such a picturesque sight on the bay, is marked.

Fleets of sailing vessels passed through the Golden gate in the early days. Nearly all the coasting trade was carried on by means of barks and ships. The bay was full of two and three masted schooners in the latter part of the 80's.

Interesting indeed, not only to the layman, but even to the seafaring man supposed to be familiar with them, are the things told by Hyslop and Rankin, these two weatherbeaten friends of the mariner. Monotonous their life may seem, but to the marine world they are men whose duties are of vital importance to commerce.

Reliability and devotion to duty are personified in these two guardians of the Golden gate.

WEALTH IN WESTERN LANDS.

The great crops of 1909 are making themselves felt in freight congestion at some points, in upward revision of estimates of the money value of the year's farm products and in a quickening of the pulse of industry and trade. That they will bring the country a year of unusual prosperity is doubted by nobody. Next year or the year after the crops may not be so abundant, but there is never a total crop failure. Even in the drought of 1901, the short corn crop had its compensation in an immense yield of wheat. Diversified farming and improved cultivation lessen the probabilities of failure in any considerable percentage of the crops. The increasing yields and the growing average of prices are makink affluent the landowners and the thrifty farmers who a few years ago had cause to complain of poverty. The improving comforts of rural life and the great financial independence are broadening the intelligence of the farmers and the growing value of the lands is building up a land-owning aristocracy in the west that is gaining in political, social and economic influence. Theirs is an influence of conservatism.

It may be impossible for the department of agriculture at Washington or any other human power to succeed in every attempt to cause two blades of grass to grow where one grew before. But there is no doubt of the efficient work done by the department in stimulating crop growing wherever possible Now the experts of that branch of the government are turning attention to opportunities in the Panama canal zone, which is under American jurisdiction. It is believed enough fruit and vegetables, including those of both the temperate and tropical climates, can be produced to meet the requirements in this direction of the 55,000 persons now residing on the zone. If this can be done a fresh triumph will be scored for the department and important economic results will follow. And all that will be in line with the practical ideas which govern the department of agriculture.

Manila has been celebrating the eleventh anniversary of the capture of the city by American troops. What has become of that Philippine disaffection and insurrection which the "anti-imperialists" were wont to predict so gloomily? asks the Evening Wisconsin. Really the admirers of Aguinaldo have had little to talk about for some time. Perhaps they will seize the incident of the invasion of New England by the regular army as an opportunity first to protest loudly and then to take to the tall timber.

The little shah of Persia is between 11 and 12 years old, about the age when the average American boy is having the care-free time of his life. Yet they propose that the young shah shall marry and assume the responsibility of a domestic establishment. And apparently they have the establishment picked out. No wonder the little fellow tried to run away. Also no wonder that even the sluggish east is awakening to the farcical character of some kinds of monarchy.

There are international exchanges of various kinds—commercial, educational and aesthetic. Years ago Great Britain inaugurated an international exchange in birds by giving this country the English sparrow. Lately England has received from this country the American robin—a generous repayment. The new arrival is much appreciated in the "tight little island." Whether the birds will stay in England through the autumn and winter is now a matter of debate.

To deprive of his adopted nationality a Chinaman who served in the navy during the civil war, was wounded five times in the service of the country, and has held citizenship papers for 35 years, must be in accord with the law, since the courts say so. But it leaves a liberty of opinion as to what sort of law it is that inflicts such results.

A Montreal paper has figured that in dancing at a ball beginning at ten o'clock at night and ending at five o'clock the next morning the distance covered is more than 11 miles. Yet the average girl prefers it to a day at the washtub, where there is very little walking.

The head of the chemical bureau says that modern housewives are Lucretia Borgias, who devote themselves to bridge while ptomaines revel unchecked in the icebox. This indictment is enough to freeze the marrow of their bones even to the extent of boycotting the icemen.

Georgia has a new law prohibiting false gossip about women. It is still lawful there, however, to tell a woman to her face that her new hat is too sweet for anything.

PEARY REFUTES THE CLAIMS OF EXPLORER COOK

ISSUES LONG PROMISED STATEMENT IN NORTH POLE DISPUTE.

GIVES STORY OF THE ESKIMOS

The Statement Is Signed by Peary, Bartlett, McMillan, Borup and Henson of the Roosevelt Party—Eskimo Boys Closely Questioned by All.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1909, by the Peary Arctic Club, in the office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington, D. C.)

New York, Oct. 12. — The following statement of Commander Robert E. Peary, which he submitted, together with the accompanying map, to the Peary Arctic club in support of his contention that Dr. Cook did not reach the north pole, is now made public for the first time. The statement and map have been copyrighted by the Peary Arctic club.

INTRODUCTION BY PEARY.

Some of my reasons for saying that Dr. Cook did not go to the north pole will be understood by those who read the following statements of the two Eskimo boys who went with him, and who told me and others of my party where he did go. Several Eskimos who started with Dr. Cook from Anoratok in February, 1908, were at Etah when I arrived there in August, 1908. They told me that Dr. Cook had with him, after they left, two Eskimo boys, or young men, two sledges and some twenty dogs. The boys were I-took-a-shoo and Ah-pe-lah. I had known them from their childhood. One was about eighteen and the other about nineteen years of age.

On my return from Cape Sheridan and at the very first settlement I touched (Nerke, near Cape Chalon) in August, 1909, and nine days before reaching Etah, the Eskimos told me, in a general way, where Dr. Cook had been; that he had wintered in Jones Sound, and that he had told the white men at Etah that he had been a long way north, but that the boys who were with him, I-took-a-shoo and Ah-pe-lah, said that this was not so. The Eskimos laughed at Dr. Cook's story. On reaching Etah, I talked with the Eskimos there and with the two boys and asked them to describe Dr. Cook's journey to members of my party and myself. This they did in the manner stated below.

((Signed) R. E. PEARY.

Signed Statement of Peary, Bartlett, McMillan, Borup and Henson, in Regard to Testimony of Cook's Two Eskimo Boys.

The two Eskimo boys, I-took-a-shoo and Ah-pe-lah, who accompanied Dr. Cook while he was away from Anoratok in 1908 and 1909, were questioned separately and independently, and were corroborated by Panikpah, the father of one of them (I-took-a-shoo), who was personally familiar with the first third and the last third of their journey, and who said that the route for the remaining third, as shown by them, was as described to him by his son after his return with Dr. Cook.

To go more into details: One of the boys was called in, and, with a chart on the table before him, was asked to show where he had gone with Dr. Cook. This he did, pointing out with his finger on the map, but not making any marks upon it.

As he went out, the other boy came in and was asked to show where he had gone with Dr. Cook. This he did, also without making any marks, and indicated the same route and the same details as did the first boy.

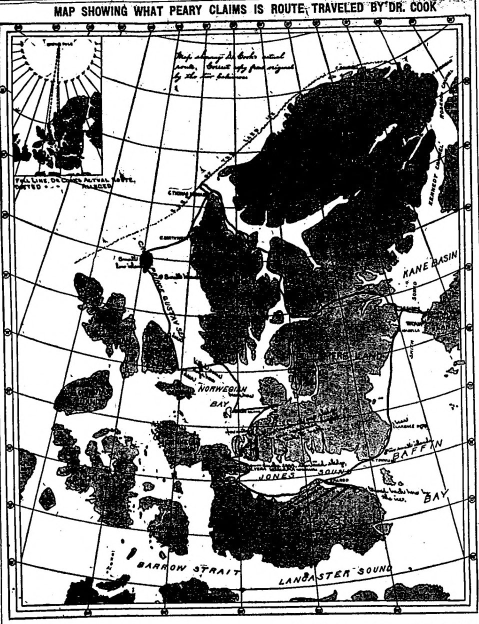
When he was through, Panikpah, the father of I-took-a-shoo, a very intelligent man, who was in the party of Eskimos that came back from Dr. Cook from the northern end of Nansen's strait, who is familiar as a hunter with the Jones Sound region, and who has been in Commander Peary's various expeditions for some fifteen years, came in and indicated the same localities and details as the two boys.

Then the first boy was brought in again, and with a pencil he traced on the map their route, members of our party writing upon the chart where according to the boy's statement, they had killed deer, bear, some of their dogs, seal, walrus and musk oxen.

The second boy was then called in and the two went over the chart together, the second boy suggesting some changes as noted hereafter.

During the taking of this testimony,

MAP SHOWING WHAT PEARY CLAIMS IS ROUTE TRAVELED BY DR. COOK



it developed that Dr. Cook had told these boys, as he told Mr. Whitney and Billy Pritchard, the cabin boy, that they must not tell Commander Peary or any of us anything about their journey, and the boys stated Dr. Cook had threatened them if they should tell anything.

The narrative of these Eskimos is as follows:

They, with Dr. Cook, Francke and nine other Eskimos, left Anoratok, crossed Smith's Sound to Cape Sabine, slept in Commander Peary's old house in Payer Harbor, then went through Rice strait to Buchanan bay. After a few marches Francke and three Eskimos returned to Anoratok.

Dr. Cook, with the others, then proceeded up Flagler bay, a branch of Buchanan bay, and crossed Ellesmere Land through the valley pass at the head of Flagler bay, indicated by Commander Peary in 1898, and utilized by Sverdrup in 1899, to the head of Sverdrup's "Bay Fiord" on the west side of Ellesmere Land.

Their route then lay out through this fiord, thence north through Sverdrup's "Heuerka Sound" and Nansen strait.

On their way they killed musk oxen and bear, and made caches, arriving eventually at a point on the west side of Nansen strait (shore of Axel Helberg Land of Sverdrup), south of Cape Thomas Hubbard.

A cache was formed here and the four Eskimos did not go beyond this point. Two others, Koolootingwah and Inughito, went on one more march with Dr. Cook and the two boys, helped to build the snow igloo, then returned without sleeping.

(These two Eskimos brought back a letter from Dr. Cook to Francke, dated the seventeenth of March. The two men rejoined the other four men who had been left behind, and the six returned to Anoratok, arriving May 7. This information was obtained not from the two Eskimo boys, but from the six men who returned and from Francke himself, and was known to us in the summer of 1908, when the Roosevelt first arrived at Etah. The information is inserted here as supplementary to the narrative of the two boys.)

After sleeping at the camp where the last two Eskimos turned back, Dr. Cook and the two boys went in a northerly or northwesterly direction with two sledges and twenty-odd dogs, one or more march, when they encountered rough ice and a lead of open water. They did not enter this rough ice, nor cross the lead, but turned westward or southwestward a short distance and returned to Helberg Land at a point west of where they had left the cache and where the four men had turned back.

After being informed of the boys' narrative thus far, Commander Peary suggested a series of questions to be put to the boys in regard to this trip from the land out and back to it.

Did they cross many open leads or much open water during this time? Ans. None.

Did they make any caches out on the ice? Ans. No.

With how many sledges did they start? Ans. Two.

How many dogs did they have? Ans. Did not remember exactly, but something over twenty.

How many sledges did they have when they got back to land? Ans. Two.

Did they have any provisions left on their sledges when they came back to land? Ans. Yes; the sledges still had about all they could carry, so they were able to take but a few things from the cache.

From here they went southwest along the northwest coast of Helberg Land to a point indicated on the map (Sverdrup's Cape Northwest).

From here they went west across the ice, which was level and covered with snow, offering good going, to a low island which they had seen from the shore of Helberg Land at Cape Northwest. On this island they camped for one sleep.

From this island they could see two lands beyond (Sverdrup's Ellef Ringnes and Amund Ringnes Lands). From the island they journeyed toward the left-hand one of these two lands (Amund Ringes Land), passing a small island which they did not visit.

Arriving at the shore of Amund Ringnes Land, the Eskimos killed a deer as indicated on the chart.

The above portion of the statement of the Eskimo boys covers the period of time in which Dr. Cook claims to have gone to the pole and back, and, the entire time during which he could possibly have made any attempts to go to it.

If it is suggested that perhaps Dr. Cook got mixed and that he reached the pole, or thought he did, between the time of leaving the northwest coast of Helberg Land at Cape Northwest, and his arrival at Ringnes Land, where they killed the deer, we must then add to the date of Dr. Cook's letter of March 17th, at or near Cape Thomas Hubbard, the subsequent four or five sleeps at that point, and the number of days required to march from Cape Thomas Hubbard to Cape Northwest (a distance of some sixty nautical miles), which would advance his date of departure from the land to at least the 25th of March, and be prepared to accept the claim that Dr. Cook went from Cape Northwest (about latitude eighty and a half degrees north) to the pole, a distance of five hundred and seventy geographical miles, in twenty-seven days.

After killing the deer they then traveled south along the east side of Ringnes Land to the point indicated on the chart, where they killed another deer.

They then went east across the south part of Crown Prince Gustav sea to the south end of Helberg Land, then down through Norwegian bay, where they secured some bears, but not until after they had killed some of their dogs, to the east side of Graham Island; then eastward to the little bay marked "Eid's Fiord" on Sverdrup's chart; then southwest to Hell's Gate and Simmon's peninsula.

Here for the first time during the entire journey, except as already noted off Cape Thomas H. Hubbard, they encountered open water. On this point the boys were clear, emphatic, and unshakable. They spent a good deal of time in this region, and finally abandoned their dogs and one sledge, took to their boat, crossed Hell's Gate to North Kent, up into Norfolk Inlet, then back along the north coast of Colin Archer Peninsula to Cape Vera, where they obtained fresh eider duck eggs. Here they cut the remaining sledge off, that is shortened it, as it was awkward to transport with the boat, and near here they killed a walrus.

From Cape Vera they went on down into the southwest angle of Jones Sound, where they killed a seal; thence east along the south coast of the sound, killing three bears at the point noted on the map, to the peninsula known as Cape Sparbo on the map, about midway on the south side of Jones Sound. Here they killed some musk-oxen and, continuing east, killed four more at the place indicated on the chart, and were finally stopped by the pack ice at the mouth of Jones Sound. From here they turned back to Cape Sparbo, where they wintered and killed many musk oxen.

After the sun returned in 1909 they started, pushing their sledge, across Jones Sound to Cape Tennyson; thence along the coast to Clarence Head; (passing inside of two small islands not shown on the chart, but drawn on it by the boys), where they killed a bear; thence across the broad bight in the coast to Cadogan Fiord; thence around Cape Isabella and up to Commander Peary's old house in Payer Harbor near Cape Sabine, where they found a seal cached for them by Panikpah, I-took-a-shoo's father. From here they crossed Smith Sound on the ice, arriving at Anoratok.

ANOTHER WOMAN CURED

By Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Gardiner, Maine.—"I have been a great sufferer from organic troubles and a severe female weakness. The doctor said I would have to go to the hospital for an operation, but I could not bear to think of it. I decided to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and Sanative Wash —and was entirely cured after three months' use of them."—Mrs. S. A. WILLIAMS, R. F. D. No. 14, Box 39, Gardiner, Me.

No woman should submit to a surgical operation, which may mean death, until she has given Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, made exclusively from roots and herbs, a fair trial.

This famous medicine for women has for thirty years proved to be the most valuable tonic and renewer of the female organism. Women residing in almost every city and town in the United States bear willing testimony to the wonderful virtue of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. It cures female ills, and creates radiant, buoyant female health. If you are ill, for your own sake as well as those you love, give it a trial.

Dorothy and the Stork.

When little Dorothy Walworth was introduced to her baby brother in the First Methodist Episcopal Parsonage in Yonkers, N. Y., she manifested intense interest, but was not astonished.

"I knew he was coming," she exclaimed; "I knew it."

Pressed for an explanation, the five-year-old said: "I was down to the Bronx zoo the other day and saw the stork in his cage. I recognized him by the black stripes on his wings that papa said were there. Well, when the stork was standing alone on one leg, I went close to him and whispered in his ear that I wanted him to bring me a baby brother or sister. He didn't say anything, but I knew he would do it, because he bent his head toward me and winked an eye."

"'Trespassers in this field are prosecuted,' he said in a grim tone.

"Dr. Hale smiled blandly.

"'But we are not trespassers, my good man,' he said.

"'What are you then?' asked the amazed farmer.

"'We're Unitarians,' said Dr. Hale."

A BANKER'S NERVE

Broken by Coffee and Restored by Postum.

A banker needs perfect control of the nerves, and a clear, quick, accurate brain. A prominent banker of Chattanooga tells how he keeps himself in condition:

"Up to 17 years of age I was not allowed to drink coffee, but as soon as I got out in the world I began to use it and grew very fond of it. For some years I noticed no bad effects from its use, but in time it began to affect me unfavorably. My hands trembled, the muscles of my face twitched, my mental processes seemed slow and in other ways my system got out of order. These conditions grew so bad at last that I had to give up coffee altogether.

"My attention having been drawn to Postum, I began its use on leaving off the coffee, and it gives me pleasure to testify to its value. I find it a delicious beverage; like it just as well as I did coffee, and during the years that I have used Postum I have been free from the distressing symptoms that accompanied the use of coffee. The nervousness has entirely disappeared, and I am as steady of hand as a boy of 25, though I am more than 92 years old. I owe all this to Postum." "There's a Reason." Pringle Joins the Goat Club

By H. TIPTON STECK

(Copyright, by Daily Story Pub. Co.)

"Well, the very idea!" gasped Mrs. Pringle, unfastening her eyes from the morning paper long enough to pour the second cup of coffee for her waiting spouse. "Did you read this piece about the latest bunko game being worked here in the city, John?"

As John's bespectacled face was at that moment buried in his cup, he could only waggle his head negatively.

"Then let me read it to you," continued Mrs. Pringle, refastening her eyes on the sheet. "I never heard of such brazen impudence. It's headed 'Warning to Business Men!'"

John's face reappeared from the depths of the cup and a rather bored expression flitted across it.

"Really, my dear," he intruded, soiling the napkin on his mustache and rising hastily, "I haven't time to listen this morning. There are several important matters that demand my immediate attention at the office, and I'm late now."

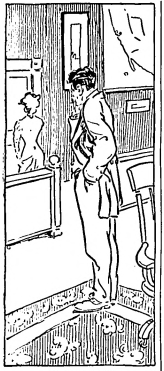
"But it won't take a minute," she argued, "and it's very interesting. Why, John, you might be—"

"I tell you I haven't time," he exclaimed impatiently, struggling into his overcoat and reaching for his hat. "Such rubbish doesn't interest me in the least. A man that would allow himself to be bunkoed in these enlightened days, ought to secure the services of a guardian.

"There, there, my dear," he soothed, seeing a suspicious moisture creeping into her eyes and her lips beginning to pucker, "I know it must be interesting and you can read it to me some other time. Good-by!"

It was rather a miffed mouth she raised to be kissed, and, jamming on his hat, Pringle hastened from the room to escape the deluge.

The office reached, he was immediately plunged into the routine of business that kept him on the hop the entire day, and the little incident of the morning was quite forgotten.



"She's a Pipin!"

Five-fifteen found him alone in the office. The clerks had gone and the dull roar throughout the great building was gradually subsiding. He felt particularly good over the day. Several large transactions had been put through successfully, and he was leaning back comfortable engaged in the pleasing occupation of figuring up his profits on the deals.

And then the Sweet-Young-Thing floated in, approaching him nervously and with some hesitation.

She was a very pretty girl; sparkling eyes, laughing mouth, pearly teeth, a wealth of glorious dark hair and all that sort of thing. Pringle made haste to remove his feet from their ungainly position on the desk and sat bolt-upright in his chair.

"By George, she's a stunner!" he thought, taking in every detail of the trim little figure before him. "Must be employed here in the building." The girl had neither hat nor coat, and a pencil was protruding from the mass of puffs. A folded something was also clutched in one tapering hand. Finding that he evidently did not resent her intrusion, the Sweet-Young-Thing launched forth into the whys and wherefores.

"Oh, Mr. Pringle," she gushed, tossing him a dazzling smile, "I hope you will pardon my approaching you in this abrupt manner, but I'm in rather an awkward predicament. My name is Madge—Valita Madge—Mr. Jackson's stenographer just across the hall, you know."

Now Jackson was his best friend, but Pringle couldn't remember for the life of him ever seeing Miss Madge in the office. Oh, well, there were many things that escaped his observation. He was very near-sighted. But it wouldn't do to acknowledge it.

"Yes, yes, to be sure, Miss Madge," he cried, beaming at her over the rims of his glasses. "Won't you be seated? Yes—there! Now, what is this awkward predicament you speak of?"

"Really, I'm afraid you'll think I'm awfully bold, sir."

"Not at all, not at all," he reassured. "I am entirely at your service."

"Thank you. It's just this: Mr. Jackson gave me my check for the the money to-night. The banks are all closed and I don't know what I'm going to do. I thought perhaps—perhaps you, Mr. Pringle, would cash the —the check for me." Again that dazzling smile was turned full upon him.

"Hm-m," grunted Pringle, his head bobbing like a wave-tossed cork, "may I see the check, please?"

The folded something, clutched in her slender hand, was unfolded and passed over. It was all very plain and proper; made to the order of Valita Madge, with Jackson's bold flourish at the bottom. The amount was one hundred dollars! Jackson always was liberal in the matter of salary.

"Hm-m," grunted Pringle again, noting the check was drawn on the First National, Jackson's bank, "I guess I can fix you out all right. Kindly endorse it over to me, Miss Madge," turning to the desk and inking a pen.

She did so, quickly, in a neat feminine hand that smacked of business college training, while Pringle manipulated the safe and took out one hundred dollars in crisp bills.

"Oh, I'm so much obliged, Mr. Pringle," she cried, her dark eyes glowing radiantly. "I don't know what I would have done if you had refused to help me. Thank you a thousand times."

"Not at all, not at all," he beamed, handing her the bills which she folded in a feminine wad to be later secreted far from the prying eyes of mortal men. "Very glad to help in any way, I'm sure."

"Thank you again, Mr. Pringle. Good-by!" She turned and tripped quietly from the office, followed by the admiring, short-sighted gaze.

"By George," he muttered, slipping the check into his wallet, "she's a pipin! Lucky dog, Jackson, to have her for a stenographer," thinking of his own red haired, freckle-faced pounder (Mrs. Pringle's choice, by the way) "Oh, well, he's a bachelor."

He stared from the window a moment, then locked his desk, got into his coat and hurried out. The descending elevator found him whistling a snatch of the popular "I Love My Wife, But Oh You Kid!"

* * *

"John," said Mrs. Pringle determinedly, as they were finishing dinner that evening, "I want to read you that piece I spoke of this morning. It's a warning to every business man, and I fail to see how you are in any way wiser than the general run."

"Very well, my dear, read it by all means," he retorted testily.

This is what she read:

"'WARNING TO BUSINESS MEN!'"

"'If a dark haired, dark eyed, neat and pretty girl trips into your office after the clerks are gone, calls you by name, says she is in an awkward predicament, that she is employed by So-and-So across the hall, that she has a check for her salary, that the banks are closed, that she needs the money right away and winds up by asking you to cash it for her, Don't Do It!

"'The woman is Molly Devoe, a noted crook and forger of St. Louis, who is now working in this city under a score of aliases. The game she plays is very smooth, and the victim usually suspects nothing until he presents the check at the bank. Then the fuss commences.

"'The woman is known to have been operating here for at least two weeks, and the police have been unable to trace her. A strong drag-net has been thrown out and her apprehension is expected hourly. A dozen prominent business men have already been swindled, and every precaution should be taken to see that no more are added to the list.'"

A stunned expression had crept into Pringle's face as his wife read, and when she finished he arose quietly and stepped to the grate, removing something from his wallet.

Mrs. Pringle stared in amazement as he slowly shredded the paper and jerked the bits savagely into the flames.

"Why John!" she gasped, "wasn't that a check?"

He turned a pair of blinking orbs upon her, then waggled his head.

"Oh, no, my dear," he gurgled thickly, "nothing of the sort. It was simply a little written form I got to-day, telling me I had been elected an honorary member of the Goat Club, that's all!"

Visiting Day.

Mrs. A. was more shocked than amused when, in reply to her question, "Who was at Sunday school this morning?" her four-year-old daughter said: "Everybody but Jesus."

"Why, my dear," said Mrs. A, "wherever did you get such an idea?"

"He was out visiting this morning," the little lady confidently said.

"Daughter," said Mrs. A., "who told you such a story?"

"Nobody didn't tell me, mother, but they just kept singing it over and over again: 'Jesus is calling, he's calling to-day.'"—Success Magazine

POULTRY AND BEES

SUMMER CARE OF THE TURKEY

Young Ones Should Not be Neglected and Allowed to Shift for Themselves Too Early.

While it is true that as soon as turkeys begin to "shoot the red" they are comparatively safe from the troubles of early life, it is not at all good policy to neglect them and allow them to take their own course without care during the remainder of the season.

The way to make the most money from turkeys, says a writer in Poultry, is to secure the largest possible frames in the beginning, and then cover these big frames with as heavy a coat of flesh as possible to get on them.

Under ordinary conditions, turkeys will find a living in the fields without much attention from the owner. They have a faculty of going about in meadows and pastures, searching for insect food, without in any way damaging the crops. Their constant search for insects makes them valuable to farmers, because their appetite for such pests leads them to destroy thousands of the farmer's worst enemies.

Because they can find a living for themselves the owner should not consider that they need no other feed beyond what the fields afford them. Growing turkeys should not be allowed to go a single day without grain feed of some kind. They should be given every evening a liberal feed of grain, of which corn should be the smaller part. This evening feed of grain keeps the young turkeys growing rapidly instead of making slow progress during the hot weather. It also gets them in the habit of coming to the house every night, and they sleep at home instead of on the most convenient fence, as they often do when not fed daily during the summer.

When turkeys are brought up to be familiar with their owners they grow much better, because they are not worried at the sight of a human being, and live quietly, growing more rapidly because of their lack of excitement.

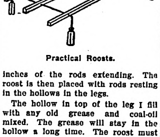
If milk is available it will pay to make cottage cheese for them every day in the year. The curd made by heating sour milk or buttermilk is very rich in those elements that go to make large frames and heavy flesh, and there is hardly any other way by which so much value may be extracted from waste milk.

LICE-PROOF POULTRY ROOSTS

Chicken Raiser of Long Experience Tells of Practical Way to Prevent Little Red Mites.

Having been in the chicken business for more than 18 years, I have been troubled a great deal with the little red mites; and have had to keep up a good, hard fight every summer to keep the upper hand of them.

I now have a roost which I built one year ago and it has been a success with me, writes L. F. Klinkerman in Farm and Fireside. It is built out of two-by-two inch stuff, the same as any ordinary roost; but the legs are cut two inches shorter than they should be. They are also out of two-by-two inch lumber. The upper end is hollowed out about one half inch deep. I bored holes in the roost proper and inserted iron rods; leaving about two inches of the rods extending. The roost is then placed with rods resting in the hollows in the legs.



Practical Roosts.

The hollow in top of the leg I fill with any old grease and coal-oil mixed. The grease will stay in the hollow a long time. The roost must be kept away from the wall far enough so when the chickens are on it that they do not touch the sides of the hen-house.

Honey Outlook.

The indications are that the season of 1909 will be known as a year of meager honey production—in marked contrast to the heavy production of 1908. Conditions have been extremely variable over all of the region east of the Mississippi, nearly all states complaining of either too much rain or two little. White clover and alsike have been fairly good yielders of nectar, but sections suffering from an excess of moisture—notably Ohio, Indiana and parts of Illinois—report an unusual proportion of honey-dew honey.

Lice Attack Young Turks.

Young turkeys are affected by lice probably more than other young poultry. The hen which hatches the turkey eggs should be dusted with insect powder several times during incubation to keep her in health and to prevent the young from becoming infested. For the same reasons the young turkeys should be kept away from chicken yards.

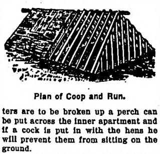
MOVABLE COOP FOR CHICKENS

Portable House May Be Used for a Variety of Purposes, Such as for Hen with Chickens.

Perfect cleanliness can be secured most effectually by moving the chicken coop to a fresh place every few days.

The coop shown in the accompanying illustration may be used for a variety of purposes, as for hens engaged in incubation, or for a hen with chickens.

In such a coop they may be kept apart from hens that lay and when sitters are to be broken up a perch can be put across the inner apartment and if a cock is put in with the hens he will prevent them from sitting on the ground.



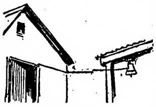
Plan of Coop and Run.

The coop should be made of inch boards and the run may be constructed of laths. Made without a floor it is much more sanitary providing it is frequently moved to a new position.

ALARM FOR POULTRY HOUSE

By Arranging Wire from Door of Building to Dwelling Notice is Given of Intruders.

By arranging a wire to pass from the hen house to a bell on the veranda of the house, after the manner shown in the accompanying illustration, warning will be given when the door of the poultry house is opened. If anything is wrong in the hen house and the alarm is given a man can close the door of the hen house while standing on the veranda by pulling the wire which is attached to the bell. During the day the wire can be unhooked and thus relieve the bell from duty.



Hen House Alarm.

If desired, the bell can be placed outside in a box, which will make it sound louder.

BEES WERE HIS PHYSICIANS

Massachusetts Man Cures Himself of Rheumatism by Allowing Little Insects to Sting Him.

By allowing swarms of bees to sting him an the bare arms and legs, J. B. Webster of Roxbury, Mass., is recovering from an attack of rheumatism. Already he has regained the use of his left arm and can walk a mile. Webster heard that bee stings were an efficacious cure for rheumatism. He hesitated for many days because of a dislike for bees acquired in boyhood, but finally decided to try the remedy. The bees took a lively interest in the healing experiment.

POULTRY NOTES.

A lazy fowl is usually a good one to eat, for it is generally fat.

To hatch well, eggs must be from good, strong stock, fertile and fresh.

A single mite can do little or no harm, but a hundred thousand of them can.

In selecting birds for winter layers, it is well to reject all those that look like culls.

Often the mysterious disappearance of the young chicks may be traced to the old family cat.

A very important thing in poultry raising is in caring for the eggs after they are layed up to the time they are marketed.

Green tender weeds thrown to the fowls afford them a variety of green stuff and save labor by not being allowed to seed.

If your chicks are not coming up to what you think they should, look and see that the fault does not lie with the male.

Poultry are said to cleanse themselves of insect pests by dusting their feathers and then shaking the pests off with the dust.

Stuffing, poultrymen assert, never did make hens lay, as it makes them fat and lazy birds never were noted for their laying qualities.

A practical poultry raiser never forgets to keep his fowls' dishes strictly clean and to supply them with good clean food and water, and plenty of it.

Strong Colonies.

Every colony in the apiary should contain a young prolific queen, for in such rests all success in bee culture. With good, superior queens we have an abundance of bees in the hive, and an abundance of bees at the right time and a good honey flow means a good crop of honey.

Interesting to Travelers.

"Is there a stone quarry being worked in the vicinity?" inquired the traveler, as he stood waiting to board his train at the country station. "I thought I heard loud reports, like the explosion of dynamite in the blasting of rocks.

"No," rejoined the porter, with a chuckle; "those noises come from that little structure off the ticket office, over there. It's the luggage room."

"Yes," answered the legal light, "and we will begin with your pocketbook."

There is not another newspaper in the state that is doing so much worrying, for fear Gov Eberhart will make a mistake, and turn the democrats out of office, as The Red Lake Falls Gazette. We wonder why?

The Red Lake Falls Gazette, remarks; that if Ole Segang gets through plowing in time he is likely to go after the scalp of one Halvor Steenerson, Well let him come, but he will have to spring something new, as the farmers have got "next" to that plow deal and the plow won't scoure as nice as it did in the last campaign.

McCleary and Tawney wants to run for congress. Well let um run and keep running, but Minnesota has no use for them in congress, at this stage of the game. What we want down there is more men like Nelson, Clapp, and Steenerson, that are not afraid to tell them stand patters where they get off at.

There has been so much criticsem of president Taft's Winona speech, on the tariff, that we decided to publish it in full. Our congressmen and senators from Minnesota all voted against this bill, except congressman Tawney, of Winona, and we are of the opinion that Taft and Tawney are wrong and the other fellows was right.

Championing the Worm.

An incident that occurred some years ago during a session of the British parliament furnished an amusing illustration of the power of satire to bring about results that sober argument often fails to accomplish.

There had been introduced a bill designed to prevent cruelty to wild animals in captivity. It was opposed on the ground that, if passed, it would endanger certain kinds of legitimate sport.

When the Earl of Kimberley arose he gravely admitted the force of this argument.

"There can be no doubt," said he, "that the bill would put an end to fishing with worms as bait. It is a bill to prevent cruelty to wild animals in captivity. The schedule states that the word 'animal' shall be held to include reptile. A worm may be held to be a reptile. A worm impaled on a hook must certainly be held to be in captivity; therefore the angler who uses a live worm for bait would be guilty of cruelty to an animal in captivity."

The laugh that followed at the expense of those against the bill robbed the opposition of whatever force it had and carried the measure to a successful issue.—Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

Sun Cooking.

Sun cooking—roasting and boiling by sunlight instead of by coal or gas—has been going on for 300 years. There are sun stoves that roast a sirloin or boil a soup to perfection. They are only used, however, by scientists. A sun stove consists mainly of a mirror—a spherical mirror—on a joint. There is also a reflector. The place for pot or plate is so situated that the mirror's rays can be focused on it accurately.

A German, Baron Tcherhausen, was the first sun cook. He began in 1687 to boil water, and in 1688 he had very good success in boiling eggs. Sir John Herschel and Buffon are other famous names associated with sun cooking. In California various sun cooks have boiled a gallon of water in twenty minutes, roasted meat in two hours and poached eggs in fifteen minutes, quite as good time as the ordinary fire makes.

An odd thing about meat roasted by sun rays is that it has an unpleasant taste. This is avoided by the insertion of a plate of yellow glass between the meat and mirror. In all solar stoves the sheet of yellow glass figures.—London Tit-Bits.

One Sided Gambling.

"One need only to try his luck at any of the Riviera gambling palaces to learn how slender are the chances to win at roulette," says a German correspondent writing from Ostend. "But if he would experience the gambler's disadvantage at its best let him come to Ostend and join the baccarat players. The game as it is played gives the man who places his money against the bank no chance whatever, and if it were known how much money is sacrificed in a season in the endeavor to win by luck and by system the public would be horrified. It is nothing unusual for the bank to win twenty-four times before an outsider wins once. The people who play, if they have ever played before, know this, and still they come again, respond to the call until they depart and plant their gold in the baccarat mire in the hope that it will bear fruit. It does. But what is the harvest?"

A Shocked Scot.

The London Chronicle says that two Englishmen recently touring in Scotland found that Sabbatarianism occasionally extends to the middle of the week. They were forced by the weather to take refuge in a small country hotel and after lunch adjourned to the billiard room to kill time until the rain stopped. The game had hardly started when the landlord entered in a very drunken condition, upbraided his visitors for their unseemly conduct and insisted on their leaving the billiard room. They received profuse apologies from the landlady. Her husband always got drunk on Sundays, she explained, but, mistaking the day, he had got drunk on Thursday instead, and from force of habit, believing it was Sunday, had been shocked at the click of the billiard balls.

Rebuked the Bishop.

The bishop of Peterborough, England, is a great motorist and is also a stanch teetotaler, and thereby hangs a tale. On one occasion, while out in his car, the chauffeur ran short of petrol and applied at a public house for some more. The publican came out, and, seeing the bishop in his episcopal dress in the car, said: "Yes, I've got plenty of petrol, but I don't sell it to the likes of them what never buys my beer."

ARAGO'S NOSE.

It Was Enormous In Size, but It Was Safely Anchored.

Emmanuel Arago, the French politician, was a nephew of the noted astronomer and was considered a handsome man, although his nose was extremely conspicuous. At one time he was traveling by train to Versailles when a child who was in the same car and who had watched Arago for some time with dilated eyes began to cry. In vain did the child's mother endeavor to calm the perturbed juvenile. The poor mother was in despair, and as the shrieks grew more and more piercing Arago felt bound to interfere and see what he could do. He said to the child:

"What ails you, my dear?"

Thus addressed, the child sobbed out, "Take off your nose."

Arago looked at the mother, who grew very confused and said:

"Ah, monsieur, excuse me—excuse my son."

"But, madame," said Arago, "what does he mean?"

The mother then explained that she had during the carnival taken her child to see a number of persons in masks and with false noses and he had become so excited that he could thing of nothing else.

"By an unfortunate occurrence," she added, "we got into the same carriage as you, who no doubt for some good reason are prolonging the carnival. But you see what a deplorable result has followed. Let me then beg of you to have pity on a poor mother and take off your nose."

"But, madame," said Arago, stupefied.

"A little more and my child will have convulsions," shrieked the mother. "Take off your false nose."

"But, madame," said Arago in despair, "that is impossible. This is not a false nose, but my own!"

"Impossible, impossible!" cried the agonized lady.

"Touch it," said Arago.

The lady gave a pull at Arago's nose, but it did not come off in her hand, as she had expected.

"A thousand pardons," she said, "but pray—oh, pray, hide it with your hat."

So Arago continued his journey with his nose in his hat, and the child's screams gradually subsided. Arago himself used to tell the story with much glee.

ROLE OF THE COCOANUT.

The Staff of Life to the Natives of Sea Washed Island.

It is more than a coincidence that the tree which furnishes a greater amount of available material to man than any other in the vast kingdom of vegetables is the first to spring up on the bare rocks of the newly arisen coral reef. The cocoanut, so formed that it may have floated halfway across the Pacific, is thus universally distributed throughout tropical islands.

It thrives best near the sea, seldom penetrating far into the interior. Its hard shell is a coat of mail for the embryo plant, enabling it to stand hard usage for a protracted period and locking up securely the precious life in miniature.

The fibrous husk which envelops it and is seldom seen on the market on account of the greatly increased bulk breaks the jar which would be inevitable should the hard nut fall unprotected from the tall tree to the ground sixty or ninety feet below.

Such a blow would scarcely fail to break the shell, occasioning the loss of the nourishing milk so necessary to the germ. The outer husk not only breaks the jar of a fall, but buoys it up on the water, while the tough outer cuticle is waterproof.

Thus is the tree which offers to man almost in the raw state all his necessities freely scattered where the warm seas and their borders offer a footing, and from it the humble native secures sugar, milk, butter, wine, vinegar, oil, candles, soap, cups, ladles, cordage, matting, thatch for roof and material for raiment, combining food, clothing and shelter in a single gift, continually making waste places habitable.—New Age.

A Long Time Dying.

Mr. Fred Terry told this anecdote of the death scene in "The Heel of Achilles:"

"One day," he says, "we were rehearsing this play, and a member of my company came in from the street and asked the call boy how far the rehearsal had got.

"'Mr. Terry's just dying,' replied the boy.

"'Good. I've time to smoke a cigarette before my entrance.'

"Presently the actor returned and repeated the question.

"'Still dying,' answered the boy.

"'Oh, I'll go and have another cigarette, then.'

"Back he came and only got the same reply from the call boy.

"Finally, after smoking five cigarettes, he asked, a little wearily, how far the rehearsal had gone.

"'Still dying,' answered the call boy.

"'Great Scott!' gasped the actor. 'He must be immortal.'"—London Answers.

The First Language.

No one of the existing languages has any legitimate claim to be considered the original of the family of languages, standing to the others as Latin, for instance, stands to Italian and French. Of an original primitive language of mankind the most patient research has found no trace. All of them—Assyrian, Phoenician, Hebrew, Arabic—are sister languages, pointing back to an earlier parent language, which has long disappeared. Since the historical period man has done little in the way of the absolute creation of language. The work had already been accomplished ages before the birth of written inscriptions.—New York American.

PRESIDENT TAFT ON THE TARIFF

An Able Discussion of the Payne Tariff Law

A Plea for Party Solidarity to the End That Party Promises May Be Fulfilled.

SPEECH AT WINONA, SEPT. 17

My Fellow Citizens:

As long ago as August, 1906, in the Congressional campaign in Maine I ventured to announce that I was a tariff revisionist, and thought that the time had come for a readjustment of the schedules. I pointed out that it had been ten years prior to that time that the Dingley bill had been passed; that great changes had taken place in the conditions surrounding the productions of the farm, the factory and the mine, and that under the theory of protection in that time the rates imposed in the Dingley bill in many instances might have become excessive; that is, might have been greater than the difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production at home with a sufficient allowance for a reasonable rate of profit to the American producer.

I said that the party was divided on the issue, but that in my judgment the opinion of the party was crystallizing and would probably result in the near future in an effort to make such revision. I pointed out the difficulty that there always was in a revision of the tariff, due to the threatened disturbance of industries to be affected and the suspension of business, in a way which made it unwise to have too many revisions. In the summer of 1907 my position on the tariff was challenged, and I then entered into a somewhat fuller discussion of the matter. It was contended by the so-called "standpatters" that rates beyond the necessary measure of protection were not objectionable, because behind the tariff wall competition always reduced the prices, and thus saved the consumer.

Revision to Protect Industries.

But I pointed out in that speech what seems to me as true today as it then was, that the danger of excessive rates was in the temptation they created to form monopolies in the protected articles, and thus to take advantage of the excessive rates by increasing the prices, and, therefore in order to avoid such a danger it was wise at regular intervals to examine the question what the effect of the rates had been upon the industries in this country, and whether the conditions with respect to the cost of production here had so changed as to warrant a reduction in the tariff and to make a lower rate truly protective of the industry.

> It will be observed that the object of the revision under such a statement was not to destroy protected industries in this country, but it was to continue to protect them where lower rates offered a sufficient protection to prevent injury by foreign competition. That was the object of the revision as advocated by me, and it was certainly the object of the revision as promised in the Republican platform.

Meaning of Platform.

I want to make as clear as I can this proposition because in order to determine whether a bill is a compliance with the terms of that platform, it must be understood what the platform means. A free-trader is opposed to any protective rate because he thinks that our manufacturers, our farmers and our miners ought to withstand the competition of foreign manufacturers and miners and farmers, or else go out of business and find something else more profitable to do.

> Now, certainly the promises of the platform did not contemplate the downward revision of the tariff rates to such a point that any industry heretofore protected should be injured. Hence, those who contend that the promise of the platform was to reduce prices by letting in foreign competition are contending for a free trade, and not for anything that they had the right to infer from the Republican platform.

Framing Bill Difficult Task.

The Ways and Means Committee of the House, with Mr. Payne at its head, spent a full year in investigation and in assembling evidence in reference to the rates under the tariff, and devoted an immense amount of work in the study of the question where the tariff rates could be reduced and where they ought to be raised with a view to maintaining a reasonable protective rate under the principles of the platform, for every industry that deserved protection. They found that the determination of the question what was the actual cost of production and whether an industry in this country could live under a certain rate and withstand threatened competition from abroad, was a question of the utmost difficulty in settling. The manufacturers were prone to exaggerate the injury which a reduction in the duty would give, and to magnify the amount of duty that was needed, while the importers on the other hand, who were interested in developing the importation from foreign shores, were quite likely to be equally biased on the other side.

Mr. Payne reported a bill—the Payne tariff bill—which went to the Senate and was amended in the Senate by increasing the duty on some things and decreasing it on others. The difference between the House bill and the Senate bill was very much less than the newspapers represented. It turns out upon examination that the reductions in the Senate were about equal to those in the House, though they differed in character. Now, there is nothing quite so difficult as the discussion of a tariff bill for the reason that it covers so many different items. The meaning of the terms and the percentages are most difficult to understand. The passage of a new bill, especially where a change in the method of assessing the duties has been followed, presents an opportunity for various modes and calculations of the percentages of increases and decreases that is really most misleading, or really throws no light at all upon the changes made.

654 Decreases; 220 Increases.

> One way of stating what was done is to say what the facts show—that under the Dingley law there were 2,024 items. This included dutiable items only. The Payne law leaves 1,150 of these items unchanged. There are decreases in 654 of the items and increases in 220 of the items. That does not give a full picture, but it does show the proportion of decreases to have been three times those of the increases.

Again the schedules are divided into letters from A to N. The first schedule is that of chemicals, oils, etc. There are 232 items in the Dingley law; of these 81 were decreased, 22 were increased, leaving 129 unchanged. Under Schdule B—earthen and glassware—there were 170 items in the Dingley law; 46 were decreased, 12 were increased and 112 left unchanged. C. is the schedule of metals and manufactures; there were 321 items in the Dingley law—185 were decreased, 30 were increased and 106 were left unchanged. D is the schedule of wood and manufactures of wood—there were 35 items in the Dingley law; 18 were decreased, 3 were increased and 14 were left unchanged. There were 38 items in sugar, and of these two were decreased and 36 left unchanged. Schedule F covers tobacco and manufactures of tobacco, of which there were 8 items; they were all left unchanged.

In the schedule covering agricultural products and provisions there were 187 items in the Dingley law; 14 of them were decreased, 19 were increased, and 154 left unchanged. Schedule H—that of spirits and wines—contained 237 items in the Dingley law; 4 were decreased, 47 increased and 186 left unchanged. In schedule J—flax, hemp and jute—there were 254 items in the Dingley law, 187 were reduced, 4 were increased and 63 left unchanged. In wool, and manufactures thereof, there were 78 items; 3 were decreased, none were increased, and 75 left unchanged. In silk and silk goods there were 78 items; of these 21 were decreased, 31 were increased and 26 were left unchanged. In pulp, papers and books there were 59 items in the Dingley law, and of these 11 were decreased, 9 were increased, and 39 left unchanged. In sundries there were 270 items, and of these 54 were decreased, 20 were increased and 196 left unchanged. So that the total showed 2,024 items in the Dingley law, of which 654 were decreased, 220 were increased, making 874 changes and 1,150 left unchanged.

Effect of Changes.

Now, attempts have been made to show what the real effect of these changes has been by comparing the imports under the various schedules, and assuming that the changes and their importance were in proportion to the importation. Nothing could be more unjust in a protective tariff which also contains revenue provisions. Some of the tariff is made for the purpose of increasing the revenue by increasing importations which shall pay duty. Other items in the tariff are made for the purpose of reducing competition, that is, by reducing importations, and, therefore, the question of the importance of a change in rate cannot in the slightest degree be determined by the amount of imports that take place.

In order to determine the importance of the changes it is much fairer to take the articles on which the rates of duty have been reduced and those on which the rates of duty have been increased, and then determine from statistics how large a part the articles upon which duties have been reduced play in the consumption of the country, and how large a part those upon which the duties have been increased play in the consumption of the country. Such a table has been prepared by Dr. Payne, than whom there is no one who understands better what the tariff is and who has given more attention to the details of the schedule.

Schedules Show Decreases.

Now, let us take Schedule A—chemicals, oils and paints. The articles upon which the duty has been decreased are consumed in this country to the extent of $433,000,000. The articles upon which the duty has been increased are consumed in this country to the extent of $11,000,000. Take Schedule B, earthen and glassware, the articles on which the duty has been decreased entered into the consumption of the country to the amount of $128,000,000 and there has been no increase in duty on such articles. Take Schedule C—metals and their manufactures—the amount to which such articles enter into the consumption of the country is $1,248,000,000, whereas the articles of the same schedule upon which there has been an increase enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of only $11,000,000.

> Take schedule D—lumber. The articles in this schedule upon which there has been a decrease enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $566,000,000, whereas the articles under the same schedule upon which there has been an increase enter in its consumption to the extent of $31,000,000.

Agricultural Products.

In tobacco there has been no change. In agricultural products, those in which there has been a reduction of rates enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $483,000,000; those in which there has been an increase enter into the consumption to the extent of $4,000,000. In the schedule of wines and liquors, the articles upon which there has been an increase enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $462,000,000. In cottons there has been a change in the higher priced cottons and an increase. There has been no increase in the lower priced cottons, and of the increases the high priced cottons enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $41,000,000. Schedule J—flax, hemp and jute—the articles upon which there has been a decrease enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $22,000,000, while those upon which there has been an increase enter into the consumption of $804,000. In schedule K as to wool, there has been no change. In schedule L as to silk, the duty has been decreased on articles which enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $8,000,000, and has been increased on articles that enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $106,000,000. On paper and pulp the duty has been decreased on articles that enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $67,000,000, and increased on articles that enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $31,000,000. In sundries, or Schedule N, the duty has been decreased on articles that enter into the consumption of the country $1,719,000,000; and increased on articles that enter into the consumption of the country $101,000,000.

Increases on Luxuries.

Moreover, it will be found that in Schedule A the increase covered only luxuries, perfumeries, pomades and like articles; Schedule N—wines and liquors—that are certainly luxuries and are made subject to increase in order to increase the revenues, amounting to $462,000,000; and in Schedule L—silks—which are luxuries certainly, $106,000,000, making a total of the consumption of those articles upon which there was an increase and which are luxuries of $579,000,000, leaving a balance of increase on articles which were not luxuries of value in consumption of only $272,000,000, as against $5,000,000,000, representing the amount of articles entering into the consumption of the country, mostly necessities, upon which there has been a reduction of duties, and to which the 654 decreases applied.

Substantial Downward Revision.

Now, this statement shows as conclusively as possible the fact that there was a substantial downward revision on articles entering into the general consumption of the country which can be termed necessities, for the proportion is $5,000,000,000, representing the consumption of articles to which decreases applies, to less than $300,000,000 of articles of necessity to which the increases applied.

> Now, the promise of the Republican platform was not to revise everything downward, and in the speeches which have been taken as interpreting that platform which I made in the campaign I did not promise that everything should go downward. What I promised was that there should be many decreases and that in some few things increases would be found to be necessary; but that on the whole I conceived that the change of conditions would make the revision necessarily downward—and that I contend, under the showing which I have made, has been the result of the Payne bill.
> I did not agree, nor did the Republican party agree, that we would reduce rates to such a point as to reduce prices by the introduction of foreign competition. That is what the free-traders desire. That is what the revenue tariff reformers desire, but that is not what the Republican platform promised, and it is not what the Republican party wished to bring about.

To repeat again with what I opened this speech—the proposition of the Republican party was to reduce rates so as to maintain a difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production here insuring a reasonable profit to the manufacturer on all articles produced in this country and the proposition to reduce rates and prevent their being excessive was to avoid the opportunity for monopoly and the suppression of competition so that the excessive rates could be taken advantage of to force prices up.

Cotton Schedule.

Now, it is said that there was not a reduction in a number of the schedules where they ought to be. It is said that there was no reduction in the cotton schedule. There was not. The House and the Senate took evidence and found from cotton manufacturers and from other sources that the rates upon the lower [illegible] as to enable them to make a decent profit but only a decent profit and they were contented with it, but that the rates on the higher grades of cotton cloth, by reason of court decisions, had been reduced so that they were considerably below those of the cheaper grades of cotton cloth, and that by undervaluations and otherwise the whole cotton schedule had been made unjust and the various items were disproportionate in respect to the varying cloths.

Hence in the Senate a new system was introduced attempting to make the duties more specific rather than ad valorem, in order to prevent by judicial decision or otherwise a disproportionate and unequal operation of the schedule. Under this schedule it was contended that there had been a general rise of all the duties on cotton. This was vigorously denied by the experts of the treasury department. At last, the Senate in conference consented to a reduction amounting to about 10 percent on all the lower grades of cotton, and this reduced the lower grades of cotton substantially to the same rates as before and increased the higher grades to what they ought to be under the Dingley law and what they were intended to be.

Now, I am not going into the question of evidence as to whether the cotton duties were too high and whether the difference between the cost of production abroad and at home allowing for a reasonable profit to the manufacturer here is less than the duties which are imposed under the Payne bill. It was a question of evidence which Congress passed upon, after they heard the statements of cotton manufacturers and such other evidence as they could avail themselves of. I agree that the method of taking evidence and the determination was made in a general way. There ought to be other methods of obtaining evidence and reaching a conclusion before that evidence is satisfactory.

Crockery Schedule.

Criticism has also been made of the crockery schedule and the failure to reduce that. The question whether it ought to have been reduced or not was a question of evidence which both committees of Congress took up and both concluded that the present rates on crockery were such as were needed to maintain the business in this country. I had been informed that the crockery schedule was not high enough, and mentioned that in one of my campaign speeches as a schedule probably where there ought to be some increases. It turned out that the difficulty was rather in under-valuations than in the character of the schedule itself and so it was not changed.

> It is entirely possible to collect evidence to attack almost any of the schedules, but one story is good until another is told, and I have heard no reason for sustaining the contention that the crockery schedule is unduly high, and so with respect to numerous details—items of not great importance—in which, upon what they regarded as sufficient evidence, the committee advanced the rates in order to save a business which was likely to be destroyed.

Evidence is Contradictory.

I have never known a subject that will evoke so much contradictory evidence as the question of tariff rates and the question of cost of production at home and abroad. Take the subject of paper. A committee was appointed by Congress a year before the tariff sittings began to determine what the difference was between the cost of production in Canada of print paper and the cost of production here, and they reported that they thought that a good bill would be one imposing $2 a ton on paper, rather than $6, the Dingley rate, provided that Canada could be induced to take off the export duties and remove the other obstacles to the importation of spruce wood in this country out of which wood pulp is made.

An examination of the evidence satisfied Mr. Payne—I believe it satisfied some of the Republican disserters—that $2, unless some change was made in the Canadian restrictions upon the exports of wood to this country, was much too low, and that $4 was only a fair measure of the difference between the cost of production here and in Canada. In other words, the $2 found by the special committee in the House was rather an invitation to Canada and the Canadian print paper people to use their influence with their government to remove the wood restrictions by reducing the duty on print paper against Canadian print paper mills. It was rather a suggestion of a diplomatic nature, than a positive statement of the difference in actual cost of production under existing conditions between Canada and the United States.

Hides, Coal and Oil.

There are other subjects which I might take up. The tariff on hides was taken off because it was found that it was not necessary to the man who raised cattle and that the profits of the cattle business were sufficient without imposing a duty on it and that the duty imposed was likely to throw the control of the sale of hides into the hands of the meat packers in Chicago. In order to balance the reduction on hides, however, there was a great reduction in shoes—from 25 to 10 percent; on sole leather from 20 to 5 per cent; on harness from 40 to 10 per cent.

So there was a reduction in the duty on coal of 33 1-3 per cent. All countervailing duties were removed from oil, naptha, gasoline and its refined products.

Lumber Duty Reduced.

Lumber was reduced from $2 to $1.25; and these all on articles of prime necessity. It is said that there might have been more. But there were many business interests in the south, in Maine, along the border, and especially in the far northwest which insisted that it would give great advantage to Canadian lumber if the reduction were made more than 75 cents. Mr. Pinchot, the Chief Forester, thought that it would tend to make better lumber in this country if a duty were retained on it. The lumber interests thought that $2 was none too much, but the reduction was made and the compromise effected. Personally I was in favor of free lumber because I did not think that if the tariff was taken off there would be much suffering among the lumber interests. But in the controversy the House and the Senate took a middle course, and who can say they were not justified.

Wool Schedule.

With respect to the wool schedule: I agree that it is too high and that it ought to have been reduced, and that it probably represents considerably more than the difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production here. The difficulty about the woolen schedule is that there were two contending factions early in the history of Republican tariffs, to-wit, growers and the woolen manufacturers, and that finally, many years ago, they settled on a basis by which wool in the grease should have 11 cents a pound, and by which allowance should be made in the shrinkage in the differential upon wool manufactures. The percentage of duty was very heavy—quite beyond the difference in the cost of production which was not then regarded as a necessary or proper limitation upon protective duties.

When it came to the question of reducing the duty at this hearing in this tariff bill on wool, Mr. Payne, in the House, and Mr. Aldrich, in the Senate, found that in the Republican party the interests of the wool growers of the far West and the interests of the woolen manufacturers in the East and in other states, reflected through their representatives in Congress, was sufficiently strong to defeat any attempt to change the woolen tariff, and that had it been attempted it would have beaten the bill reported from either committee. I am sorry this is so, and I could wish that it had been otherwise. It is the one important defect in the present Payne tariff bill, and in the performance of the promise of the platform to reduce rates to a difference in the cost of production with reasonable profit to the manufacturer.

Increase on Clothing Not Likely.

That it will increase the price of woolen cloth or clothes, I very much doubt. There have been increases by the natural increase in the price of wool the world over as an agricultural product, but this was not due to the tariff, because the tariff was not changed. The increase would, therefore, have taken place whether the tariff would have been changed or not. The cost of woolen cloths, behind the tariff wall, through the effect of competition, has been greatly less than the duty, if added to the price, would have made it.

There is a complaint now by the woolen clothiers and by the carded woolen people of this woolen schedule. They have honored me by asking in circulars sent out by them that certain questions be put to me in respect to it, and asking why I did not veto the bill in view of the fact that the woolen schedule was not made in accord with the platform. I ought to say in respect to this point that all of them in previous tariff bills were strictly in favor of maintaining the woolen schedule as it was. The carded woolen people are finding that carded wools are losing their sales because they are going out of style. People prefer worsteds.

The clothing people who are doing so much circularizing were contented to let the woolen schedule remain as it was until very late in the tariff discussion, long after the bill had passed the house, and indeed they did not grow very urgent until the bill had passed the Senate. This was because they found that the price of woolen cloth was going up and so they desired to secure reductions in the tariff which would enable them to get cheaper material. They themselves are protected by a large duty, and I cannot with deference to them ascribe their intense interest only to a deep sympathy with the ultimate consumers so-called. But as I have already said, I am quite willing to admit that allowing the woolen schedule to remain where it is, is probably not a compliance with the terms of the platform as I interpret it and as it is generally understood.

Best Tariff Law Ever Enacted.

On the whole, however, I am bound to say that I think the Payne tariff bill is the best tariff bill that the Republican party ever passed; that in it the party has conceded the necessity for following the changed conditions and reducing tariff rates accordingly. This is a substantial achievement in the direction of lower tariffs and downward revision and it ought to be accepted as such.

Iron and Iron Ore.

Critics of the bill utterly ignore the very tremendous cuts that have been made in the iron schedule, which heretofore has been subject to criticism in all tariff bills. From iron ore, which was cut 75 percent, to all the other items as low as 20 percent, with an average of something like 40 or 50 percent, that schedule has been reduced so that the danger of increasing prices through a monopoly of the business is very much lessened, and that was the chief purpose of revising the tariff downward under Republican protective principles.

The severe critics of the bill pass this reduction in the metal schedule with a sneer, and say that the cut did not hurt the iron interests of the country. Well of course it did not hurt them. It was not expected to hurt them. It was expected only to reduce excessive rates, so that business should still be conducted at a profit, and the very character of the criticism is an indication of the general injustice of the attitude of those who make it, in assuming that it was the promise of the Republican party to hurt the industries of the country by the reductions which they were to make in the tariff, whereas it expressly indicated as plainly as possible in the platform that all of the industries were to be protected against injury by foreign competition, and the promise only went to the reduction of excessive rates beyond what was necessary to protect them.

High Living Cost Not Due to Tariff.

The high cost of living, of which 50 percent is consumed in food, 25 percent in clothing and 25 percent in rent and fuel, has not been produced by the tariff because the tariff has remained the same while the increases have gone on. It is due to the change of conditions the world over. Living has increased everywhere in cost—in countries where there is free trade and in countries where there is protection—and that increase has been chiefly seen in the cost of food products.

In other words, we have had to pay more for the products of the farmer, for meat, for grain, for everything that enters into food. Now, certainly no one will contend that protection has increased the cost of food in this country when the fact is that we have been the greatest exporters of food products in the world. It is only that the demand has increased beyond the supply, that farm lands have not been opened as rapidly as the population and the demand has increased.

I am not saying that the tariff does not increase prices in clothing and in building and in other items that enter into the necessities of life, but what I wish to emphasize is that the recent increase in the cost of living in this country has not been due to the tariff. We have a much higher standard of living in this country than they have abroad, and this among the workingmen, the farmers and all classes. Higher wages have been made possible by the encouragement of diversified industries, built up and fostered by the tariff.

Tariff Protective; Not Destructive.

Now, the revision downward of the tariff that I have favored, will not I hope destroy the industries of the country. Certainly it is not intended to. All that it is intended to do, and that is what I wish to repeat, is to put the measure of the tariff where it will protect industries here from foreign competition, but will not enable those who will wish to monopolize the excessive prices by taking advantage of excessive rates beyond the normal difference in the cost of production.

If the country desires free trade, and the country desires a revenue tariff and wishes the manufacturers all over the country to go out of business, and to have cheaper prices at the expense of the sacrifice of many of our manufacturing interests, then it ought to say so and ought to put the Democratic party in power if it thinks that they can be trusted to carry out any affirmative policy in favor of a revenue tariff. Certainly in the discussions in the Senate there was no great manifestation on the part of our Democratic friends in favor of reducing rates on necessities. They voted to maintain the tariff rates on everything that came from their particular section. If we are to have free trade, certainly it cannot be had through the maintenance of Republican majority in the Senate and House and a Republican administration.

Tawney Downward Revisionist.

And now the question arises what was the duty of a member of Congress who believed in a downward revision greater than that which has been accomplished, who thought that the wool schedule ought to be reduced, and that perhaps there were other respects in which the bill could be improved? Was it his duty because in his judgment it did not fully and completely comply with the promises of the party platform as he interpreted it, and indeed as I had interpreted it, to vote against the bill? I am here to justify those who answer this question in the negative.

Mr. Tawney was a downward revisionist like myself. He is a low tariff man, and has been known to be such in Congress all the time he has been there. He is a prominent Republican, the head of the Appropriation committee, and when a man votes as I think he ought to vote, and an opportunity such as this presents itself, I am glad to speak in behalf of what he did, not in defense of it, but in support of it.

Party Solidarity Essential.

This is a government by a majority of the people. It is a representative government. People select some 400 members to constitute the lower House, and 92 members to constitute the upper House through their legislatures, and the varying views of a majority of the voters in 80 or 90 millions of people are reduced to one resultant force to take affirmative steps in carrying on a government by a system of parties. Without parties popular government would be absolutely impossible. In a party, those who join it, if they would make it effective, must surrender their personal predilections on matters comparatively of less importance in order to accomplish the good which united action on the most important principles at issue secures.

Now, I am not here to criticise those Republican members and Senators whose views on the subject of the tariff were so strong and intense that they believed it their duty to vote against their party on the tariff bill. It is a question for each man to settle for himself. The question is whether he shall help maintain the party solidarity for accomplishing its chief purposes, or whether the departure from principle in the bill as he regards it, is so extreme that he must in conscience abandon the party.

All I have to say is, in respect to Mr. Tawney's action, and in respect to my own in signing the bill, that I believed that the interests of the country, the interests of the party required me to sacrifice the accomplishment of certain things in the revision of the tariff which I had hoped for in order to maintain party solidarity which I believe to be much more important than the reduction of rates in one or two schedules of the tariff.

Had Mr. Tawney voted against the bill, and there had been others of the House sufficient in number to have defeated the bill, or if I had vetoed the bill because of the absence of a reduction of rates in the wool schedule, when there was a general downward revision and a substantial one, though not a complete one, we should have left the party in a condition of demoralization that would have prevented the accomplishment of purposes and a fulfillment of other promises which we had made just as solemnly as we had entered into that with respect to the tariff.

When I could say without hesitation that this is the best tariff bill that the Republican party has ever passed, and therefore the best tariff bill that has been passed at all, I do not feel that I could have reconciled any other course to my conscience than that of signing the bill, and I think Mr. Tawney feels the same way.

Prosperity of Country at Stake.

Of course if I had vetoed the bill I would have received the applause of many Republicans who may be called low tariff Republicans, and who think deeply on that subject, and of all the Democracy. Our friends, the Democrats, would have applauded, and others laughed in their sleeve at the condition in which the party would have been left; but more than this, and waiving considerations of party, where would the country have been had the bill been vetoed, or been lost by a vote? It would have left the question of the revision of the tariff open for further discussion during the next session. It would have suspended the settlement of all our business down to a known basis upon which prosperity could proceed and investments be made, and it would have held up the coming of prosperity to this country certainly for a year and probably longer. These are the reasons why Mr. Tawney voted for the bill. These are the reasons why I signed it.

But there are additional reasons why the bill ought not to have been beaten. It contained provisions of the utmost importance in the interest of this country in dealing with foreign countries and in the supplying of a deficit which under the Dingley bill seemed inevitable.

Maximum and Minimum Clause.

There has been a disposition in some foreign countries, taking advantage of greater elasticity in their systems of imposing tariffs and of making regulations, to exclude our products and exercise against us undue discrimination. Against these things we have been helpless, because it required an act of Congress to meet the difficulties. It is now proposed, by what is called the maximum and minimum clause, to enable the President to allow to come into operation a maximum, or penalizing increase of duties over the normal or minimum duties whenever in his opinion the conduct of the foreign countries has been unduly discriminatory against the United States. It is hoped that very little use may be required of this clause, but its presence in the law and the power conferred upon the Executive, it is thought will prevent in the future such undue discriminations. Certainly this is most important to our exporters of agricultural products and manufactures.

Corporation Tax.

Second: We have imposed an excise tax upon corporations measured by one per cent, upon the net income of all corporations except fraternal and charitable corporations, after exempting $5,000. This it is thought will raise an income of 26 to 30 millions of dollars, will supply the deficit which otherwise might arise without it and will bring under federal surpervision more or less all the corporations of the country. The inquisitorial provisions of the act are mild but effective, and certainly we may look not only for a revenue but for some most interesting statistics and the means of obtaining supervision over corporate methods and provisions of law that has heretofore not obtained.

Free Trade With Philippines.

Then we have finally done justice to the Philippines. We have introduced free trade between the Philippines and the United States, and we have limited the amount of sugar and the amount of tobacco and cigars that can be introduced from the Philippines to such a figure as shall greatly profit the Philippines, and yet in no way disturb the products of the United States or interfere with those engaged in the tobacco or sugar interests here

These features of the bill were most important, and the question was whether they were to be sacrificed because the bill did not in respect to wool and woolens and in some few other matters meet our expectations. I do not hesitate to repeat that I think it would have been an unwise sacrifice of the business interests of the country. It would have been an unwise sacrifice of the solidarity, efficiency and promise-performing power of the party, to have projected into the next session another long discussion of the tariff, and to have delayed or probably defeated the legislation needed in the improvement of our interstate commerce regulation, and in making more efficient our anti-trust law and the prosecutions under it.

Such legislation is needed to clinch the Roosevelt policies, by which corporations and those in control of them shall be limited to a lawful path and shall be prevented from returning to these abuses which a recurrence of prosperity is too apt to bring about unless definite positive steps of a legislative character are taken to mark the lines of honest and lawful corporate management.

Tariff Board.

Now there is another provision in the new tariff bill that I regard as of the utmost importance. It is a provision which appropriates $75,000 for the President to employ persons to assist him in the execution of the maximum and minimum tariff clause and in the administration of the tariff law. Under that authority I conceive that the President has the right to appoint a board, as I have appointed it, who shall associate with themselves, and have under their control a number of experts who shall address themselves first to the operation of foreign tariffs upon the exports of the United States, and then upon the operation of the United States tariff upon imports and exports. There are provisions in the general tariff procedure for the ascertainment of the cost of production of articles abroad and the cost of production of articles here.

I intend to direct the board, in the course of these duties and in carrying them out, in order to assist me in the administration of the law, to make what might be called a glossary of the tariff, or a small encyclopedia of the tariff, or something to be compared to the United States Pharmacopeia with reference to information as to drugs and medicines. I conceive that such a board may very properly, in the course of their duties, take up each item of the tariff, both those on the free list and those which are dutiable, describe what they are, where they are manufactured, what their uses are, the methods of manufacture, the quantity of the manufacture, the cost of production abroad and here and every other fact with respect to the item which would enable the Executive to understand the operation of the tariff, the value of the article, and the amount of duty imposed, and all those details which the student of every tariff law finds it so difficult to discover. I do not intend, unless compelled or directed by Congress, to submit the result of these investigations but to treat them merely as incidental facts brought out officially from time to time, and as they may be ascertained and put on record in the Department, there to be used when they have all been accumulated and are sufficiently complete to justify the executive recommendation based on them.

Give the Law a Chance.

Now I think it is utterly useless, as I [illegible] it would be pretty difficult to [illegible] business to take up another revision of the tariff during the present Congress. I should think it would certainly take the rest of this administration to accumulate the data upon which a new and proper revision of the tariff might be had. By that time the whole Republican party can express itself again in respect to the matter, and bring to bear upon their Representatives in Congress that sort of public opinion which shall result in solid party action.

I am glad to see that a number of those who thought it their duty to vote against the bill insist that they are still Republicans and intend to carry on their battle in favor of lower duties and a lower revision within the lines of the party. That is their right and in their view of things is their duty. It is vastly better that they should seek action of the party than that they break off from it and seek to organize another party which would probably not result in accomplishing anything more than merely in defeating our party and inviting in the opposing party which does not believe, or says that it does not believe in protection.

I think that we ought to give the present bill a chance. After it has been operating for two or three years we can tell much more accurately than we can to-day its effect upon the industries of the country and the necessity for any amendment in its provisions.

I have tried to state as strongly as I can, but not more strongly than I think the facts justify, the importance of not disturbing the business interests of this country by an attempt in this Congress or the next to make a new revision, but meantime I intend, so far as in me lies, to secure official data upon the operation of the tariff from which, when a new revision is attempted, exact facts can be secured.

I have appointed a tariff board that has no brief for either side in respect to what the rates shall be. I hope they will make their observations and note their data in their record with exactly the same impartiality and freedom from anxiety as to result with which the weather bureau records the action of the elements, or any scientific bureau of the government records the result of its impartial investigations. Certainly the experience in this tariff justifies the statement that no revision shall hereafter be attempted in which more satisfactory evidence of an impartial character is not secured.

I am sorry that I am not able to go into further detail with respect to the tariff bill, but I have neither the information nor the time in which to do it. I have simply stated the case as it seemed to Mr. Tawney in his vote and as it seemed to me in my signing the bill.

THE NEW TARIFF.

The Outlook, of which Theodore Roosevelt is contributing editor, has the following to say concerning the recently enacted tariff law:

It is a protectionist measure, framed by protectionists in fulfillment of a protectionist platform, and will be administered by a protectionist government. Tariff for Revenue Reformers and Freetraders may not approve it, but they cannot, on the ground it is a protectionist measure, condemn Congress for passing it or Mr. Taft for signing it. If the country could today, in a referendum election, vote on the question, Shall the United States maintain the protective system, adopt a tariff for revenue only, or make its foreign trade as free as its domestic trade? the protective system would be sustained by a large majority. The new law must therefore be judged upon three counts: Is it a protective measure? Is the protection it provides designed for the benefit of the entire Nation? And does it in any efficient degree keep the promises of the Republican party and Mr. Taft to give the country "downward revision?" We think President Taft was amply justified in signing the bill on all three counts.

At first Mr. Taft held himself aloof from the conflict of pocketbook protectionists. It is a very serious matter for a President in the United States or a Prime Minister in England to initiate a fight with his party. President Johnson tried it in the United States on the Reconstruction issue, and Gladstone tried it in England on the Home Rule issue, in both cases disastrously to their political careers. Mr. Taft is an experienced and sagacious statesman; at first quietly and by means of private persuasion, and latterly with open vigor, he insisted that Congress should legislate for the public and not for the private interests. The political leaders of the special interests did not desire a fight with the President; they are probably increasingly aware that a public campaign, such as a veto of the Tariff bill would inevitably have initiated, would be disastrous to them. On the other hand, the President wished to avoid a veto if possible; a tariff campaign lasting for a year or two would be injurious, perhaps seriously injurious, to the general welfare of the country. When two parties in conflict enter into negotiations, and both desire to compromise, a compromise generally results. It has so resulted in this case. The Payne law is a compromise; it is not entirely satisfactory to the President. But the country ought to recognize the difficulty of his position and support him in the compromise he has succeeded in advancing the general welfare as opposed to a surrender to the forces of special privilege.

That he has so succeeded and that the bill, in its final form, is by far the most enlightened protectionist measure ever enacted in the history of the country, we believe, for reasons which will be found in the fol- [illegible] Reduction of Duties. There has been a very radical reduction of duties in certain important fields. Duties on coal, oil, lumber, iron and steel, shoes, harness and leather goods, and works of art, among other things have all been materially reduced. The woolen schedules, it is true, are unchanged, and there is also great dissatisfaction with the cotton schedule. But the iron and steel schedules, which up to this time have formed the special stronghold of the uncompromising protectionists, have been captured by the forces of downward revision. This alone is a great step in advance. The President, who makes no secret of the fact that he is not satisfied with the failure of the new tariff to reduce the woolen duties, regards, it is believed, the successful revision of the tariff on iron products as a precedent for what may and will be done in the near future with regard to woolen. While many schedules in the present bill remain higher than genuine revisionists would like to see them, nevertheless there have been substantial and far-reaching reductions, such as the protectionist leaders of the republican party have never before been willing to submit to. Whether these reductions are sufficient to affect the prices to the "ultimate consumer" of necessary commodities time only can tell.

* * * * *

We repeat that the general character, and pariticularly the special provisions, of the Tariff act, as we have endeavored to indicate in the foregoing summary, entitle it to the approval of the country as an advanced step in the line of economical, political, and social reform.

THE PRESIDENT AT WINONA.

President Taft traveled half way across the Continent to reach the very heart of the land of tariff insurgency, in order that he might there deliver his defense of the Payne tariff law. He came to the home city of the one Minnesota Congressman who had, after a hard fight for honest downward tariff revision on the floor, given the assent of his vote to the final compromise.

But the President came in no spirit of faultfinding or contentiousness. He came as the leader of his party, pleading for government by party, asserting the essential merit of the new law. He came, as he aptly said, not to defend Mr. Tawney, but to support him in so doing, the President was justifying his own course. "For," said he, "when a man stands with me, I stand with him."

Two of Mr. Taft's finest qualities shone out clearly in this Winona speech—his courage and his candor. The hostility that might have been provoked by his courageous defense of the Payne law, he disarmed by the very candor with which he admitted its serious faults. With the judicial calm of a great jurist he summed up the case, and gave his reasons for finding in its favor.

The iniquity of the wool schedule he freely admitted, but with the engaging frankness so characteristic of the man pointed out that the combination of the wool growers of the West and the woolen makers of the East in Congress was so strong that to change the schedule meant to defeat the bill. It meant to give up all the advance that had been made toward real revision on other schedules; it meant the continuation of the tariff debate into another session with its disturbing effects on business; it meant the demoralization of the Republican party and the abandonment, at least in large part, of the great program of constructive legislation to which it and its leader, the President, are committed.

Mr. Taft, in fine, took his hearers up onto the bench beside him, while all the case for and against the bill passed in review before them. He led them with him through the course of reasoning that took him in the end to the signature of the bill, as it had already taken Mr. Tawney to voting for it on final passage.

But he had no word of blame for the Minnesota Ten who voted against the bill. Each man, he conceded, had to decide for himself whether he ought to "help maintain the party solidarity for accomplishing its chief purposes, or whether the departure from principle in the bill, as he regarded it, was so extreme that he must in conscience abandon the party."

What the President could not well say, but what is nevertheless a fair inference from his arguments, is this: James A. Tawney, fighting on the floor of the House for free lumber, fighting for honest revision, fighting for the Minnesota idea, and at the last voting for the best bill it was possible to get, was of far more value to Minnesota than some of his colleagues who did nothing but follow the leader in the bill's formative stage and then vote against it in the end.

The weight of the President's words, then, bears heavily for the solidarity of the party organization in Congress. He perceives that government by party is the only possible scheme of things for a true republic. In no other way can progress be made. Important legislation is always a matter of compromise and adjustment. Party progress cannot be effectuated by a party that is riven with faction. There are other matters pressing for action beside the tariff. It is, therefore, the merest political sagacity to maintain the party, to give up for its sake sometimes dearly cherished desires, in order that its work may go on in orderly, effective fashion, and that the will of the people may be done. Not otherwise is free government successfully to be carried on.—Minneapolis Journal, Sept. 18, 1909.

THE PRESIDENT ON THE TARIFF

The things which Mr. Taft said in his speech in Winona about the tariff are just what ought to have been expected, but he said them with a little more emphasis and decisiveness than had been looked for. When he signed the bill he said that it did not suit him in every particular, but he declared that it was the best bill which could be obtained from Congress, and therefore ought to be placed on the statute book. At Winona he cited one or two items to which he objected, particularly some portions of the woolen schedule, but he did not believe that the duties would increase the prices of woolen cloths. By the use of a table which had been prepared by the Ways and Means committee he pointed out that the general direction of the changes in the tariff was downward. The decreases in the duties touch goods which in the previous year, were imported to the extent of $4,674,000,000, while the increases in duties affected imports of only $1,026,000,000. The reductions were more than four times the extent of the expansions. After looking at the measure calmly in the five weeks which have passed since its enactment, Mr. Taft declares that he believes it to be the best tariff which the Republican party ever passed, and therefore the best which the country has ever seen.

After all the uncertainty which the country had between the Republican promise of revision in June, 1908, and the enactment of that revision in August, 1909, industry is entitled to a rest for a few years from further tariff alterations. Let us give the new law a fair test before we think of making changes in it. No test can be fair unless it extends through several years.

Business responded to the enactment of the Payne law by making a long step forward, and there has been a steady advance ever since. If there were any serious belief of further changes in the schedules in the session which begins in December of this year, or in the session which open a year later, the advance would be checked, and that trade activity which the country wants, and which promises to appear before the end of 1909, would be postponed. As it stands, the new law may be said to carry out the pledge of the platform of 1908. It was a protective tariff that the people, by a plurality of 1,250,000, voted for last November. That is the sort of a tariff which has been placed on the books. If the people had wanted a tariff without any protection in it they would have elected Mr. Bryan and a Democratic House of Representatives. Mr. Bryan says his party will make the tariff an issue in the campaign of 1910, but he is mistaken. He himself may talk about it, but as his party split on that question near the middle of Congress, and as there is a feud upon it between Messrs. Bailey and Bryan now, with Messrs. Stone Danie, McEnery and many other Democrats supporting Bailey, the Democracy can make no fight in 1910 or 1912 on the tariff unless it is a fight in its own ranks. The party unity to which small differences of opinion must conform demands that the Republican line be kept intact in the campaign which is only a year ahead of us. The country's credit and prosperity depend on the election of a Republican House of Representatives in 1910. Many live issues are before the country, and the Republican party is the only organization which is capable of dealing with those questions courageously and intelligently.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat, Sept. 20, 1909.

TAFT AND THE INSURGENTS.

We do not read, in the incomplete reports of Taft's Winona, Minn., speech, any such emphatic declaration of condemnation of the insurgents as is read into it by the commentators and headline writers. * * *

"Now, I am not here to criticise those Republican members and Senators whose views on the subject of the tariff were so strong and intense that they believed it their duty to vote against their party on the tariff bill. It is a question for each man to settle for himself. The question is whether he shall help maintain the party solidarity for accomplishing its chief purposes, or whether the departure from principle in the bill as he regards it, is so extreme that he must in conscience abandon the party."

This is very different from declaratively asserting that the insurgents abandoned the party. He knows they are true republicans as he. A man may disagree with his party without abandoning it even temporarily. Taft says that it is a question with each one whether he shall help maintain the party solidarity on an issue or whether the departure from principle in said issue is so extreme that he must in conscience break party lines.—The Journal, Lewiston, Me., Sept. 18, 1909.

Trees That Explode.

All lightning blasted trees explode as overcharged boilers do. The flame of the lightning does not burn them up, nor does the electric flash split them like an ax. They simply explode, overcharged, as may be a boiler with steam. The lightning is conducted into the damp interstices of the trunk and into the hollows under the bark. Its tremendous heat at once turns all the moisture in those cramped spaces into steam. This steam in its immediate explosion blows the tree asunder.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

Judgment Reversed.

A middle aged and nervous tenant in an apartment house had summoned his next door neighbor, a young woman student at the conservatory, into court and charged that the peace and quiet of his lodgings had been disturbed by her singing.

The court was inclined to regard the proceedings as unwarranted.

"How much do you sing?" he asked the defendant.

"Only two hours a day," she answered. "An hour in the morning and one at night."

"Two hours!" said the judge. "It appears unreasonable to complain of that."

"But, your honor," interposed the complainant, starting up excitedly, "I trust you will not decide the matter until you have heard the defendant sing."

The defendant was not at all loath to sing. In fact, her personal assurance and professional pride urged her to make the most of this opportunity in the interests of high art.

She began an aria from Wagner, but she had sung but four or five bars when the court interrupted her.

"That will do—that will do," he said. "No further testimony need be taken. The court's judgment is reversed."—Youth's Companion.

A Bobolink With a Canary Song.

A friend of mine tells of a bobolink which learned to sing like a canary. He was captured when quite small and given a cage beside a fine singer, for which he soon exhibited a great attachment. He would sit perfectly still on his perch for a long time watching his friend intently, then try his best to imitate his sweet notes. He tried for three or four weeks before making any progress; then he succeeded in sounding one note almost correctly. When he realized his success his wild joy was pathetic, and the canary's pleasure was very evident. Then he redoubled his efforts until he could sing nearly the whole canary song. After that he and Dick always sang in concert. But, strangest of all, his character seemed to change with his song. Instead of singing but a short time in the spring, as bobolinks do, he sang all the time except when molting. And he imitated his friend's characteristics so perfectly that he became a canary in all but appearance.—Ella H. Stratton in Suburban Life.

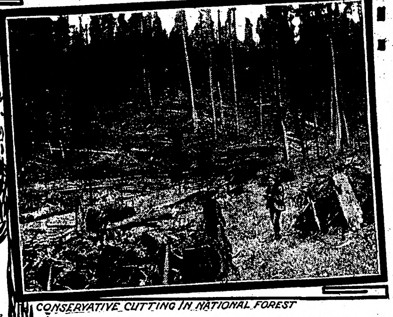
THE TASK OF THE FOREST SERVICE

By Overton W. Price



CONSERVATIVE CUTTING IN NATIONAL FOREST

A LITTLE more than 10 years ago Gifford Pinchot took charge of the government forest work. Up to then the duties of the division of forestry lay mainly in compiling forest data and statistics, its usefulness was necessarily narrow, and its discontinuance in contemplation. The work employed 10 persons, of whom two were professional foresters.

The forest service now administers the national forests, whose aggregate area is about the same as Texas and Ohio combined, and whose money value is more than twice that of the total equipment of the army and navy. It furnishes the chief source of information and assistance to private forest owners and users, who wish to practice forestry. Its force numbers about 3,000, of whom 250 are professional foresters.

This great machine is administered under a policy which has the approval and the co-operation of the American people. It is not an impractical policy constructed by theorists—by those who sometimes hit the bystander instead of the bullseye, because they have not learned the use of the gun with which they shoot. Nor is it a foreign policy, expected to meet conditions under which it was not constructed. The policy of the forest service makes no fetish of the forest. It urges no destructive upheaval in economic conditions. But when the line is plain between the use of the national forests or any of their resources, for the permanent benefit of many, or for the temporary benefit of a few, the forest service encourages use by the many and prevents its monopoly by the few.

FOREST RANGER PUTTING OUT FOREST GROUND FIRE WITH WET SADDLE BLANKET

A FOREST RANGER MOVING CAMP

There are two planks in the platform of the forest service. They are these:

To insure through public ownership and administration the fullest permanent use of those forests which are essential to the public welfare.

To teach American citizens how to make the best use of forests in private hands and of their product, by finding out and telling them how.

The 194,500,000 acres of national forests stand for the first plank. They conserve most of the water and one-third of the timber of the west. This national heritage, whose measurable material resources are worth more than two billions of dollars, is being administered by the forest service in the best permanent interest of all the people. At an average cost for protection of about one-fifth of a cent per acre, the damage by fire on national forests for the last three years has been, per million acres, about three per cent. of that on private forest lands. In these three years the use of the national forests by the people has more than doubled. In 1908, so great were the demands of the people's business, that an average of only about one-fifth of the time of the forest rangers could be given to fire patrol. This was the equivalent of all the time of one man for the patrol of 580,000 acres, an area half the size of the state of Delaware.

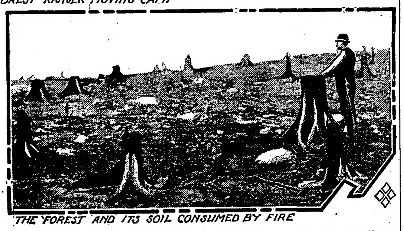
From Arizona to the Canadian border and from California to Minnesota and Arkansas, the forest rangers have done their duty. This has meant unrelenting effort, usually under frontier conditions. There is no more exacting work than fire patrol; and, short of war, nothing makes greater claims than fire fighting upon personal courage, fiber and devotion. The forest rangers are the backbone of the service. Were it not for them, the national forests would soon be forests no longer. And as each of these public servants comes to lay down his tools for younger hands to pick up, he will leave behind him, in the vigorous, unscarred forests of his district, a valuable heritage to the community and the honorable record of a trust fulfilled.

The protection of the national forests from fire is incidental only to the development of their fullest permanent use. This use is limited only so far as is needed to insure the permanence of the forest and to keep it in satisfactory condition. Last year 1,500,000 cattle and horses and 7,500,000 sheep and goats grazed within national forests, or 12 and 21 per cent., respectively, of the range stock of the west. Nearly 400,000,000 feet of mature timber was sold and cut, or enough to build 25,000 ordinary frame houses. More than 130,000,000 feet more was given away to settlers for firewood and other home uses. All this timber was cut and logged conservatively, to the improvement of the condition of the forest. Under such management a forest produces wood forever.

For a man can handle his forest in three different ways, just as he can handle money in three different ways, and the same is true of a nation. He can destroy his forest by wasteful logging and the fire which follows it, just as he can squander money until it is all gone. He can protect his forest adequately from fire or other injury, but fail to harvest its crop, just as he can lock up money in a safe and let it lie there protected from loss, but unproductive and useless. Or he can handle his forest rightly and profit by the interest without impairing the capital, like the man who invests money safely and well.

There is nothing intricate about the principles or the practice of forestry. It has its own careful, skilled methods based on study comparatively recent in this country, but which in other countries began hundreds of years ago. To describe these methods would fill many pages and it takes trained men to apply them. But in the last analysis forestry is common sense, scientifically applied. Cut the mature trees, but do not cut them until they have shed seed enough to start young trees to make another forest. Remember always that the sapling will make a valuable tree some day if it is not injured, just as a boy will make a wage earner if he has his chance. Keep fire out of the forest, because it is worse than the axe in careless hands, for the fire consumes everything, young trees and old, and the forest soil as well. Waste nothing. These are the principles under which logging is done in the national forests. The result is to make of them a factory as well as a storehouse of wood.

But the usefulness of the national forests does not end with producing timber and grass. Their still larger value to the nation is in conserving stream flow. These mountain forests are to the streams of the west what the storage battery is to the wire—the source of energy in reserve. Without forests to check the run-offs, streams fluctuate or even go dry for part of the year; but those streams which rise in well forested watersheds maintain a comparatively even flow.



THE FOREST AND ITS SOIL CONSUMED BY FIRE

The reclamation service, when its task is finished, will have turned 50,000,000 acres of desert into fertile farm land, dotted with homes. Under its director, Frederick Haynes Newell, whose achievement is national and enduring, this work, unparalleled in scope, is going successfully forward. The story of what has been done by the men of the reclamation service, in the face of engineering difficulties historic in their magnitude, has yet to be adequately written. But for the permanent success of its work, the reclamation service must depend not merely upon its reservoirs and dams, but upon the thoroughness with which the forest service does its duty. The preservation of the national forests is vital to the fulfillment of the national irrigation policy.

In the conservation of water used for the development of power through electricity, as well as for irrigation, lies another great function of the national forests, whose importance is only beginning to be generally realized. In the regulation of the development of this power within national forests, through the leasing of power sites without passage of title to the user, through a charge for the occupancy and use of these sites and through rigid provisions against combination and monopoly, the forest service is effectively safeguarding, within national forests, the interests of the American people, whose property these water powers are. Herein lies the greatest public service which the forest service is rendering. The standing timber in the national forests, which is alone sufficient if it were cut clean to meet all the needs of the nation for 10 years, is of less value than the sites for the development of water power, whose usefulness these forests conserve. The complete destruction of this timber by fire would be far less grave than for the power sites within national forests to pass into unregulated corporate ownership or control.

The power of the immediate future is water power. The trust of the immediate future is the power trust, if nation, state and citizen fail to do their utmost. In some regions this trust is already firmly intrenched. In others it is in the making. In every region it is spreading, strengthening, acquiring, where men need power to work for them and water runs down hill. To say there are no combinations to control water powers is to be of them, or to be misinformed.

In addition to their resources of water, wood and grass, the national forests serve a host of minor uses of great importance to the settlers who live in and near them and to the development of the communities in which they lie. A total of about 10,000 permits for these minor uses have been granted, involving the occupancy of national forest land or the use of other resources, of which more than half were without charge.

This vast and increasing business is handled by the officers of the forest service, who are the servants of the people, in the interest first of all of the small man. The timber and the grass the national forests produce cost a fair price to the lumberman and the stockman.

The forest service is not charged with the regulation of corporations. But it is charged with the right care of a vast public property. It sees to it that the yield from this property, the water, the wood and the grass, goes first to those who need it most—to the home builders. For every permit granted to a man to graze 1,000 head of stock or more, the forest service has granted 10 permits to small owners to graze their little bunches of sheep and cattle. For every large sale of timber, it has made 20 small sales to feed the little sawmills upon which the frontier communities depend.

The national forests are to the west what coal is to the engine. The forest service is the stoker. There is coal enough in the bunkers to keep a full head of steam throughout the run, if it is not wasted. If it be wasted, the engine will soon slow down for lack of fuel.

Prisoner Put Coming Gastronomic Joy Ahead of a Brief Period of Liberty.

A colored man from Georgia had lived in Washington but a few years when he was arrested for some slight violation of the city ordinances. Upon hearing that the negro was in jail, the secretary of the colored Y. M. C. A. secured the services of a minister to go with him and sign the prisoner's bail bond. They reached the jail shortly before noon, and told the negro the object of their visit. In response to the proffered kindness he said:

"Mistah Johnsing, I sho is glad you-all is gwine to git me out, but I wants you-all to fix it so I can't git out till late dis evenin'."

Of course the two Samaritans were somewhat taken aback by this unusual request. But a moment later they lost their breath when, in answer to the secretary's question, the Georgia negro replied in a whisper:

"Well, sah, dey's a-gittin' dinnah ready, an' dey's cookin' greens; an' I sho would like to git some o' dem greens befo' I leabes dis place!"—Lippincott's.

His Proper Field.

A colored man was brought before a police judge charged with stealing chickens. He pleaded guilty and received sentence, when the judge asked how it was he managed to lift those chickens right under the window of the owner's house when there was a dog loose in the yard. "Hit wouldn't be no use, judge," said the man, "to try to 'splain this thing to yo' all. Ef you was to try it you like as not would get yer hide full of shot an' get no chickens, nuther. Ef yo' want to engage in any rascality, judge, yo' better stick to de bench, whar yo' am familiar."—Ladies' Home Journal.

BUYS A GOLD BRICK

PAYS "INNOCENT OLD MINER" $25,000 FOR $15 WORTH OF BRASS.

CLEVER CONFIDENCE MEN WIN

Clever Confidence Men Win Well Acted Comedy Takes in Land Man and His Son—Swindlers Leave No Clue.

Minneapolis, Oct. 15.—H. F. Chaffee, millionaire Dakota land-owner, president of the Amenia & Sharon Land Company, and heavily interested in the John Miller Grain Company, Minneapolis, paid $25,0&00 in real money to a clever swindler who successfully worked upon him the time-honored gold brick trick. In return for the small fortune, Mr. Chaffee found himself the possessor of 80 pounds of yellow metal, probably worth about $15.

The operators of the swindle were "John Armstrong," a gray-hared miner and the owner of a fictitious gold mine of fabulous resources in old Mexico, and "W. H. Harper," Philadelphia, archaelogist of wide repute and reliable assayer of precious metals, the former occupying modest quarters at the Beaufort hotel and the latter holding forth in the finest suite of rooms in the Rogers hostelry.

Mr. Chaffee met Armstrong three days ago at Chaffee's home in Amenia, N. D., where the swindler told a story that he was in search of an uncle by the name of Chaffee.

Gold As Security.

He told of the two golden ingots, worth $40,000 at any government mint, which he held in two trunks in Minneapolis, ready to be placed as security for the $25,000 loan.

Mr. Chaffee was more than interested and agreed to accompany the miner to Minneapolis and look at the gold. His son, E. W. Chaffee, himself an assayer, accompanied him on the trip.

Armstrong, producing an auger and steel drill, bored several small holes in each of the yellow disks. The Chaffees in the meantime scraped up the metal shavings.

When a handful of these had been secured, Armstrong placed them in an envelope and the trio started out to find a competent assayer to compute the purity of the gold.

At the store of J.B. Hudson & Son, jewelers, Armstrong went inside alone. He joined the group in several minutes with a card bearing the names of two assayers, who he said were highly recommended by this firm. One was a St. Paul man, but the other, W. H. Harper, was located at the Rogers hotel.

The party went there and, in answer to a card, Mr. Harper sent down word that, although he was rather busy, he would see the gentlemen for a few minutes.

Applied the Acid Test.

Taking some nitric acid, which the younger Mr. Chaffee had thought it best to purchase in person, Mr. Harper applied it to the metal shavings submitted to him by Mr. Armstrong, and after watching the action of the acid, pronounced the metal to be of the highest grade.

The next move was made at the Security National bank where Mr. Chaffee cashed a personal check for $25,000. All three parties concerned then returned to the Beaufort, where the money, 25 crisp one thousand dollar bills, was handed over to Armstrong.

Took Dinner Together.

At the invitation of Armstrong, all went to the Nicollet cafe for dinner. In the course of the meal the younger Chaffee, becoming suspicious, left the table and hurried to the Rogers hotel in search of Mr. "Harper."

In answer to his anxious inquiries at the desk, he learned that the assayer "of wide repute" had checked out of the hotel a few minutes after the departure of the Chaffees earlier in the evening.

In the meantime, his father waited for him at the cafe. Finally Armstrong said that he could remain no longer but would return in half an hour.

That was the last seen of him, for five minutes later his effects were moved from the Beaufort and the police have been unable to trace him since.

FLAXSEED PRICE GOES UP.

Minneapolis. — Because it rained Sunday and was cold Monday, the price of flax seed went up 16 cents a bushel. There was a snappy bull market on at the Chamber of Commerce and some excitement.

Minnesota and the Dakotas have raised a good flaxseed crop, but it has not been moving in very fast from the farms. Only 318 cars were brought in by the railroads, compared with 386 a year ago.

Fist Fight Fatal.

Green Bay, Wis.—Henry Hoberg, a member of the J. J. Hoberg Paper Mill Company, was almost instantly killed by a blow in the throat from the fist of Fred Kramer in a saloon fight.

Hoberg persisted in playing cards with Kramer and his party and finally Kramer became angry and with his fist administered the fatal blow. Hoberg was 34 years old and leaves a wife, mother and five brothers, while Kramer, is 25 and unmarried. The latter, has surrendered.

GRAIN MOVEMENT IS HEAVY.

2,624 Cars Have Already Been Shipped. Fear Shortage.

Minneapolis, Minn.—With 2,624 cars of grain moved into Minneapolis and Duluth over Sunday, the northwest railroads present tonnage figures to start the new, week that fore-shadow a big increase in October gross earnings, and suggest the possibility of a scracity of cars before the month has passed. To date, there has been no appreciable car shortage and no serious congestion at terminals.

Minneapolis will not experience a freight congestion if good management and anticipation can prevent. The Minneapolis & Eastern, the little road that serves the milling district, was badly crowded, but the mills and elevators have so far handled the grain well, and expect to clear up, notwithstanding the switching of a good part of the 712 cars of wheat, out of the total of 1,102 cars of grain received, to the mills. The state inspection department and the Northern Demurrage Bureau were able to handle everything in a satisfactory manner.

Neither the Great Northern, Milwaukee, Soo or Northern Pacific roads report any shortage of cars, but all admit that merchandise, lumber, livestock and other traffic is taxing the motive power, and is likely to be heavier before October has passed. Barley, rye and oats are being loaded more heavily in the country. The flax crop is beginning to move.

Railroad managers expect no serious difficulty, so long as terminals can be kept open. The enforcement of drastic orders limiting the time in which cars must be emptied and returned, has operated to keep the Minneapolis sidetracks clear.

About two thousand five hundred loaded grain cars are on the Minneapolis side-tracks at this time. Should receipts continue at the present rate, congestion would be unavoidable, but the Monday figures are always heaviest, and receipts of the other days of this week are not expected to come within 70 per cent of the present.

The origin of the grain tonnage is shown in the inspection report, so far as made, covering 914 cars, containing wheat, corn, oats, barley, rye and flax. The grain moved in as follows:

Road.	Cars.
Great Northern	371
Milwaukee	160
Soo	165
Omaha	85
Northern Pacific	81
Minneapolis & St. Louis	48
Great Western	4
Total	914

The Great Northern and Northern Pacific figures do not fairly represent tonnage being handled, as those roads are moving much grain to Duluth.

BIG RELIGIOUS CONVENTION.

Congregational Brotherhood of America is Holding National Meeting.

Minneapolis, Minn.—With a "message to the men of Minneapolis," delivered at a down-town meeting by Dr. Frank W. Gunsaulus, of Chicago, the second national convention of the Congregational Brotherhood of America opened at noon. The attendance is large, and all parts of the country being represented, and the enthusiasm is intense. This evening the President, John H. T. Main, of Iowa college, will preside at the second session, and the speakers will be Dr. S. B. Capen, of Massachusetts; Henry M. Beardsley, of Kansas, and Dr. Gunsaulus.

Others who will address the convention before the closing on Sunday evening are E. L. Smith, of Seattle; Prof. A. P. Hollis, of North Dakota; Fred B. Smith, of New York; Dr. W. B. Forbush, of Michigan; President Northrop, of the University of Minnesota; President M. L. Burton, of Smith college; T. C. MacBillan, of Chicago; Wayne B. Wheeler, of Ohio, and, at the annual banquet Saturday night, Mayor Haynes, of Minneapolis, and Booker T. Washington.

CALLS CANAL BOARD TOGETHER.

Gov. Eberhart Arranges Conference on Superior-Mississippi Project.

St. Paul. — Governor A. O. Eberhart has summoned the Lake Superior and Mississippi River Canal Commission to meet on Tuesday, Nov. 9, in the governor's office, to take up the work laid out by the legislature. The act creating the commission directs it to investigate the feasibility and practicability of a ship or barge canal from Lake Superior to the Mississippi river.

The legislature outlined a comprehensive program, but failed to make any appropriation, and state officials anticipate that little can be accomplished of practical value. Members of the legislature agreed last winter that a system of inland waterways would have a tendency to reduce and equalize freight rates and generally indorsed all the navigation schemes proposed, but no estimates were presented of the amounts necessary to construct a canal such as proposed or any of the other waterways suggested.

St. Paul. — Frank A. Day will become a literary man. Having been lieutenant governor of the state, later political manager and director, in addition to having been an editor, Mr. Day now branches into the realm of authorship, and willl prepare a biography of the late Governor John A. Johnson.

Mr. Day will have associated with him a newspaper man, to assist in the preparation of the material, and both wil work in collaboration with Mrs. Johnson A. Johnson.

LIPTON WILL TRY TO "LIFT" AMERICA'S CUP

Sir Thomas Will Issue a Challenge if Universal Yacht Rules Are Used.

Sir Thomas Lipton has decided to make another attempt to "lift" the America's cup. The baronet sailed for New York on October 9 for the purpose of looking over the ground and consulting the authorities of the New York Yacht club in an endeavor to induce them to permit him to challenge under the universal rule. While in America he will visit the middle west and has expressed his intention of stopping some time in Chicago.

"I am as hot on the trail of the America's cup as ever," said Sir Thomas. "I am willing and anxious to challenge, but it must be under the universal rule which prevails at every regatta in America. I think what is a good enough rule for all American yacht clubs to race under, should be good enough for the cup races.

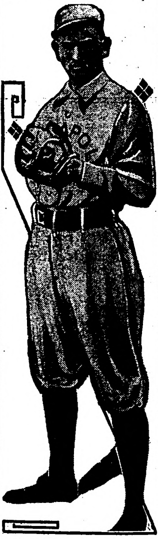
"I will build and sail any size the New York club wishes under the universal rule, which was adopted to prevent freaks like the Shamrock, Columbia, Reliance, etc., sailing in the America cup races. No builder of any repute will build under that antiquated, 56-year-old rule, as it would mean a more magnificent freak than ever before.

"It is all very good to sail freaks around Sandy Hook and Long Island sound, but to sail a freak across the Atlantic is a different matter.

"I don't say that if the New York Yacht club is willing to accept a challenge under the universal rule, that I would win, but I would try my hardest and would certainly give the American public good sport. I cannot understand why the New York Yacht club wishes to make the conditions of this particular race entirely to suit themselves and thereby debar me from participating, when the deed of gift has a mutual clause inserted that makes it quite easy for the committee to meet my requests.

"I am sure if the man who drew the deed of gift were alive he would be the first to say 'Give Lipton a chance under the rule obtaining in every other race in American waters.'"

ROW OVER THIS PITCHER



Mike Cantillon, president of the Minneapolis club, is on the trail of the National Commission. Mike, who is a brother of Joe Cantillon, this year manager of the Senators claims that the supreme body practically made him lose the pannant in the association by ordering Comiskey to recall Pitcher Olmstead from him during the latter part of August.

The leader of the Millers said it was agreed that the Sox would get Olmstead after the association season closed in September. Then the middle of August he was informed by the commission that a new rule compelled Olmstead to report to Comiskey on or before August 20.

The movement found its root at Michigan, and is aimed at Chicago. It was first talked almost a year ago. Alumni of Chicago and Michigan were inclined to discredit the story.

BACKACHE IS KIDNEYACHE.

Usually There Are Other Troubles to Prove It.

Pain in the back is pain in the kidneys, in most cases, and it points to the need of a special remedy to remove and cure the congestion or inflammation of the kidneys that is interfering with their work and causing that pain that makes you say: "Oh, my back."

Thompson Watkins, professional nurse, 420 N. 23rd St., Parsons, Kan., says: "For some time I was annoyed with sharp twinges across the small of my back and irregular passages of the kidney secretions. Since using Doan's Kidney Pills, I am free from these troubles."

Fair School Teachers Blissfully Unaware of Contents of Box on Which They Rested.

"While in Paris this summer another girl and I went out to Versailles one afternoon," said a school teacher who had just returned from abroad. "It was dusk when we reached the railway station, and as there was no waiting room we sat down on two crates that were out on the platform among a lot of others. We noticed that the station employes kept staring at us with a persistence that was annoying. Presently a man in a shabby uniform with a bucket on his arm approached us. He touched his cap deferentially and said—in French, of course:

"'Mesdames, pray do not let me disturb you, but I am forced to open the boxes on which you are seated in order to feed the boa constrictor and other serpents that are within.'

"When we recovered from our fright we found we had been seated in the midst of a huge collection of snakes that had just arrived from their native jungles en route for the zoo near Versailles."

It was the itchy, watery kind and we had to keep his little hands wrapped up all the time, and if he would happen to get them uncovered he would claw his face till the blood streamed down on his clothing. We called in a physician at once, but he gave an ointment which was so severe that my babe would scream when it was put on. We changed doctors and medicine until we had spent fifty dollars or more and baby was getting worse. I was so worn out watching and caring for him night and day that I almost felt sure the disease was incurable. But finally reading of the good results of the Cuticura Remedies, I determined to try them. I can truthfully say I was more than surprised, for I bought only a dollar and a half's worth of the Cuticura Remedies (Cuticura Soap, Ointment and Pills), and they did more good than all my doctors' medicines I had tried, and in fact entirely cured him. His face is perfectly clear of the least spot or scar of anything. Mrs. W. M. Comerer, Burnt Cabins, Pa., Sept. 15, 1908."

The "line-up" man was a facetious soul. The woman for whom he was putting up a pulley clothes-line was exacting. She ordered it put in a certain place, which it was almost impossible for him to reach. He hesitated. "If I have to put it there, lady," he said, "I'll break my neck." Still she did not relent. "All right, lady," he consented, with a cheerful grin, "but it'll cost yer $2 extry if I break my neck."

Deafness Cannot Be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

Quaker Oats

In an article published in the Youth's Companion of September 23rd, 1909, Dr. Browne, the great medical authority on foods, says, about brain and muscle building—

"There is one kind of food that seems to me of marked value as a food to the brain and to the whole body throughout childhood and adolescence (youth), and that is oatmeal.

"Oats are the most nutritious of all the cereals, being richer in fats, organic phosphorus and lecithins."

He says oatmeal is gaining ground with the well-to-do of Great Britain. He speaks of it as the mainstay of the Scottish laborer's diet and says it produces a big-boned, well-developed, mentally energetic race.

His experiments prove that good oatmeal such as Quaker Oats not only furnishes the best food for the human being, but eating it strengthens and enlarges the thyroid gland—this gland is intimately connected with the nourishing processes of the body.

In conclusion he says—

"It seems probable therefore that the bulk and brawniness of the Northerners (meaning the Scotch) has been in some measure due to the stimulation of the thyroid gland by oatmeal porridge in childhood."

The Scotch eat Quaker Oats because it is the best of all oatmeals.

New Geyser in Yellowstone Park.

For a few days past there have been indications of an eruption of some kind near the Fountain hotel in Yellowstone park, says a dispatch from Mammoth Hot Springs, Wyo. Now a new and magnificent geyser has broken out in full force about 100 feet north of the regular Fountain geyser near Fountain hotel. This new geyser, which does not appear to affect any of the others in that vicinity, played to a height of 150 to 200 feet, throwing off immense quantities of hot water, mud and steam. The new geyser does not play regularly as does Old Faithful, but at short intervals, the eruptions occurring five or six hours apart, and lasting about one hour.

"You must be more specific," the lady replied. "Are you a member of the senate or of the house?"

Aids Nature

The great success of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery in curing weak stomachs, wasted bodies, weak lungs, and obstinate and lingering coughs, is based on the recognition of the fundamental truth that "Golden Medical Discovery" supplies Nature with body-building, tissue-repairing, muscle-making materials, in condensed and concentrated form. With this help Nature supplies the necessary strength to the stomach to digest food, build up the body and thereby throw off lingering obstinate coughs. The "Discovery" re-establishes the digestive and nutritive organs in sound health, purifies and enriches the blood, and nourishes the nerves—in short establishes sound vigorous health.

If your dealer offers something "just as good," it is probably better FOR HIM...it pays better. But you are thinking of the cure not the profit, so there's nothing "just as good" for you. Say so.

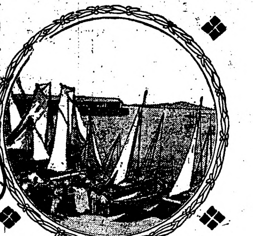
LOCK TYPE OF CANAL QUICKEST AND SAFEST

BY LIEUT. COL. GEO. W. GOETHALS, U.S. ARMY

CHAIRMAN AND CHIEF ENGINEER, ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSION

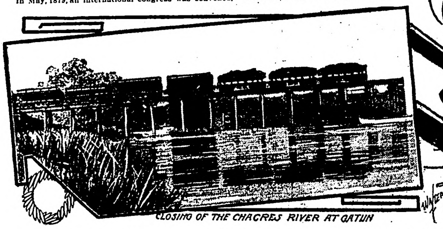


LOW TIDE NEAR THE PACIFIC TERMINUS OF THE CANAL.

A CANAL connecting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans has occupied public attention for upward of four centuries, during which period various routes have been proposed, each having certain special or peculiar advantages. It was not until the nineteenth century, however, that any definite action was taken looking toward its accomplishment.

In 1876 an organization was perfected in France for making surveys and collecting data on which to base the construction of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama and in 1878 a concession for prosecuting the work was secured from the Colombian government.

In May, 1879, an international congress was convened, under the auspices of Ferdinand de Lesseps, to consider the question of the best location and plan of the canal. This congress, after a two weeks' session, decided in favor of the Panama route and of a sea-level canal without locks. De Lesseps' success with the Suez canal made him a strong advocate of the sea-level type and his opinion had considerable influence in the decision.



CLOSING OF THE CHAGRES RIVER AT GATUN

Immediately following this action the Panama Canal Company was organized under the general laws of France, with Ferdinand de Lesseps as its president. The concession granted in 1878 by Colombia was purchased by the company and the stock was successfully floated in December, 1880. The two years following were devoted largely to surveys, examinations and preliminary work. In the first plan adopted the canal was to be 29.5 feet deep, with a ruling bottom width of 72 feet. Leaving Colon, the canal passed through low ground to the valley of the Chagres river at Gatun, a distance of about six miles; thence through this valley for 21 miles, to Obispo, where, leaving the river, it crossed the continental divide at Culebra by means of a tunnel, and reached the Pacific through the valley of the Rio Grande. The difference in the tides of the two oceans, nine inches in either direction from the mean in the Atlantic and from nine to 11 feet from the same datum in the Pacific, was to be overcome and the final currents reduced by a proper sloping of the bottom of the Pacific portion of the canal. No provisions were made for the control of the Chagres river.

In the early eighties, after a study of the flow due to the tidal differences a tidal lock near the Pacific was provided. Various schemes were also proposed for the control of the Chagres, the most prominent being the construction of a dam at Gamboa. The dam as proposed afterward proved to be impracticable and this problem remained, for the time being, unsolved. The tunnel through the divide was also abandoned in favor of an open cut.

First Change from Sea Level to Lock Type.

Work was prosecuted on the sea-level canal until 1887, when a change to the lock type was made, in order to secure the use of the canal for navigation as soon as possible. It was agreed at that time that the change in plan did not contemplate abandonment of the sea-level canal, which was ultimately to be secured, but merely its postponement for the time being. In this new plan the summit level was placed above the flood line of the Chagres river, to be supplied with water from that stream by pumps. Work was pushed forward until 1889, when the company went into bankruptcy, and on February 4, that year, a liquidator was appointed to take charge of its affairs. Work was suspended on May 15, 1889. The new Panama Canal Company was organized in October, 1894, when work was again resumed, on the plan recommended by a commission of engineers.

This plan contemplated a sea-level canal from Limon bay to Bohio, where a dam across the valley created a lake extending to Bas Obispo, the difference in level being overcome by two locks; the summit level extended from Bas Obispo to Paraiso, reached by two more locks, and was supplied with water by a feeder from an artificial reservoir created by a dam at Alhajuela, in the upper Chagres valley. Four locks were located on the Pacific side, the two middle ones at Pedro Miguel combined in a flight.

A second or alternative plan was proposed at the same time, by which the summit level was to be a lake formed by the Bohio dam, fed directly by the Chagres. Work was continued on this plan until the rights and property of the new company were purchased by the United States.

United States Become Interested.

The United States, not unmindful of the advantages of an isthmian canal, had from time to time made investigations and surveys of the various routes. With a view to government ownership and control congress directed an investigation of the Nicaraguan canal, for which a concession had been granted to a private company. The resulting report brought about such a discussion of the advantages of the Panama route to the Nicaraguan route that by an act of congress, approved March 3, 1889, a commission was appointed to make full and complete investigation of the Isthmus of Panama, with a view to the construction of a canal . . . to connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans . . . and particularly to investigate the two routes known respectively as the Nicaragua route and the Panama route, with a view to determining the most practicable and feasible route for such canal, together with the approximate and probable cost of constructing a canal at each of the two or more of said routes.

The commission reported on November 16, 1901, in favor of Panama and recommended the lock type of canal. The plan consisted of a sea-level section from Colon to Bohio, where a dam across the Chagres valley created a summit level 82 to 90 feet above the sea, reached by two locks. The lake or summit level extended from Bohio to Pedro Miguel, where two locks connected it with a pool 28 feet above mean tide, extending to Miraflores, the location of the final lock. The ruling bottom width of the canal prism was fixed at 150 feet, increased at the curves and in the submerged channels. In Panama bay the width was fixed at 200 feet and in the artificial channel in Limon bay 500 feet was adopted, with turning places 800 feet wide. The minimum depth was 35 feet and the locks were to have usable lengths of 740 feet and widths of 84 feet. The commission assessed the value of the rights, franchises, concessions, lands, unfinished work, plans and other property, including the railroad of the New Panama Canal Company, at $40,000,000.

EXCAVATING FOR THE SITE OF THE GREAT GATUN DAM, LOOKING SOUTH

By act of congress, approved June 28, 1902, the president of the United States was authorized to acquire, at a cost not exceeding $40,000,000, the property rights of the New Panama Canal Company on the Isthmus of Panama and also to secure from the Republic of Colombia perpetual control of a strip of land not less than six miles wide, extending from the Caribbean sea to the Pacific ocean.

Pursuant to the legislation, negotiations were entered into with Colombia and with the New Panama Canal Company, with the end that a treaty was made with the Republic of Panama granting to the United States control of a 10-mile strip, constituting the Canal Zone, with the right to construct, maintain and operate a canal. This treaty was ratified by the Republic of Panama on December 2, 1903, and by the United States on February 23, 1904.

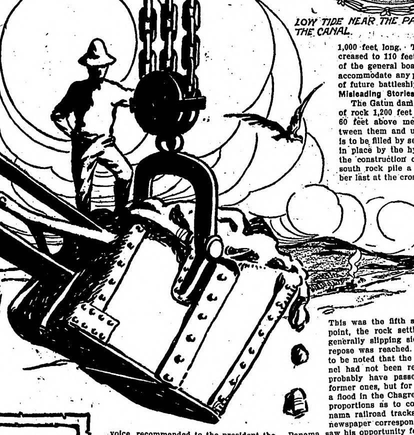
The formal transfer of the property of the New Panama Canal Company on the isthmus was made on May 4, 1904, after which the United States began the organization of a force for the construction of the lock type of canal, in the meantime continuing the excavation by utilizing the French material and equipment and such labor as was procurable on the isthmus.

Lock Type is Adopted.

The question of a sea-level canal was again agitated and secured such recognition that the president convened the international board of engineers, consisting of 13 members, to assemble at Washington on the first day of September, 1905, for the purpose of considering the various plans for the construction of the canal that would be submitted to it.

As a result of its deliberations the board submitted a majority report and a minority report signed by five of its members, the former advocating a sea-level canal and the latter a lock canal, with the summit level 85 feet above mean tide.

The Isthmian Canal Commission, with one dissenting voice, recommended to the president the adoption of the lock type recommended by the minority, which was also strongly advocated by the then chief engineer, Mr. John F. Stevens.



On June 29, 1906, congress provided that a lock type of canal be constructed across the Isthmus of Panama, of the general type proposed by the minority of the board of consulting engineers, and work has continued along these lines. As originally proposed, the plan consisted of a practically straight channel 500 feet wide, 41 feet deep from deep water in the Caribbean to Gatun, where an ascent to the 85-foot level was made by three locks in flight. The level is maintained by a dam approximately 7,700 feet long, one-half mile wide at the base, 100 feet wide at the top, constructed to 135 feet above mean tide. The lake formed by this dam, 171 square miles in extent, carried navigation to Pedro Miguel, where a lock of 30 feet lift carried the vessel down to a lake 55 feet above mean tide, extending to Sosa hill, where two locks overcame the difference of level between the lake surface and the Pacific. Nineteen and eight-hundredths miles of the distance from Gatun to Sosa hill had a channel 1,000 feet at the bottom, a minimum channel for 4½ miles through Culebra of 200 feet at the bottom. The balance of the distance varied in width to 800 feet, the larger portion of the entire canal being not less than 500 feet. The depth of water was fixed at 45 feet. The lake assured a perfect control of the Chagres river.

Improvements in Original Plans.

Certain changes have been made in the original project, the most important being the withdrawal of the locks from Sosa to Miraflores, which was recommended and adopted in December, 1907. This resulted in a change in the direction of the channel in Panama bay. A breakwater is being constructed from Sosa to Naos island which, by cutting off the silt-bearing cross-current, which has always been troublesome, protects the channel against silting.

A second change is the widening of the 4½ miles of Culebra cut to a width of 300 feet at the bottom. This was done by executive order and was not made on the recommendation of the commission.

A third change is the location of the breakwaters in Colon harbor. The necessity for these breakwaters was made apparent in the latter part of January, when a storm of some magnitude seriously interfered with shipping. As originally proposed for both sea-level and lock types, the breakwaters were parallel to the axis of the channel excavated in Limon bay. If so constructed, sufficient area would not be given to dissipate the waves entering head on into the channel and they would not afford much, if any, protection to shipping. These breakwaters are to be built out from Manzanillo island and Toro point, so as to give a sheltered anchorage and also an opportunity for such expansion to the waves as to break them up.

A fourth change is in the dimensions of the locks. As proposed by the minority they were 900 feet by 95 feet, usable lengths and widths. These dimensions were subsequently changed by the commission at the instigation of the president to dimensions 100 feet wide and 1,000 feet long. The width was again increased to 110 feet on the recommendation of the general board of the navy, so as to accommodate any possible increase in beam of future battleships.

Misleading Stories About the Gatun Dam.

The Gatun dam is to consist of two piles of rock 1,200 feet apart and carried up to 60 feet above mean tide. The space between them and up to the required height is to be filled by selected material deposited in place by the hydraulic process. During the construction of the north side of the south rock pile a slip occurred in November last at the crossing of the French canal.

This was the fifth slip that occurred at this point, the rock settling to some extent, but generally slipping sidewise until the angle of repose was reached. In this connection it is to be noted that the silt deposits in the channel had not been removed. This slip would probably have passed unnoticed, as did the former ones, but for the fact that at the time a flood in the Chagres river had attained such proportions as to cover a portion of the Panama railroad tracks just south of Gatun. A newspaper correspondent, going from Colon to Panama, saw his opportunity for a sensational story and attributed the flood to the dropping of the Gatun dam into the subterranean lake under the dam and locks, which another faker had previously discovered, and the news of the destruction of the Gatun dam was cabled to the United States.

The slip did not affect the south slope or side of the rock pile. It was entirely local and did not in any way interfere with the work. It would not have occurred had steps been taken during construction to give the proper slope to the rock pile, but economy of time and money did not warrant such precaution. As stated by one of the engineering publications, "We can state from actual personal examination that this incident has absolutely no engineering significance."

As a result, however, the public is told that dire disaster will follow the undertaking unless the present plans are abandoned and the Straits of Panama constructed—that is, a sea-level canal across the isthmus 500 or 600 feet wide. To accomplish this, however, a lock canal must be built first and subsequently widened and deepened until the ideal is reached. There is no data available for such a canal. With mountains instead of hills to be removed estimates are, of course, impossible; so the most optimistic figures, suitable alone to the ideal, are offered as a bait. In any event it is also claimed that Bohio should have been selected for the site of the dam in lieu of Gatun.

As between Gatun and Bohio, at both places the distance from the natural surface to the rock is so great that any attempt to found the dam on the last named material will be attended by enormous expense. At Bohio the gorge in its lower strata is filled with water-bearing gravel, and to make the dam safe the underflow through these strata would have to be cut off by some means extending down 165 feet. No such strata exist at Gatun, so, for this reason alone, leaving out of consideration the advantages in the control of the Chagres river and to navigation by reason of the greater extent of lake, Gatun offers the better site.

Both the majority and minority of the board of consulting engineers considered Gatun a suitable location for a dam; the former adopted it for the typical lock canal used for comparison with the sea-level canal, the latter for the 85-foot summit-level canal. The majority, however, feared the existence of an underground flow in case of the higher dam, but investigations have failed to disclose any. The great mass of underlying material is not sandy and gravelly deposits, as was supposed, but a mixture of these materials so firmly cemented together with clay as to make the strata in which they occur impervious to water.

Foundation at Gatun Is Satisfactory.

I venture the statement, without fear of contradiction, that the site of no public or private work of any kind has received such a thorough and exhaustive examination and investigation as the foundation of the dam and locks at Gatun. There is no longer a doubt concerning any of the underlying strata; neither the impermeability nor the ability of the foundations to bear the loads that will be brought upon them can be questioned if the data be carefully and impartially examined. The investigations fail to disclose any water-bearing strata or the existence of that underground stream with a discharge equal to the Chagres river itself, which was recently asserted as a fact on the floor of the senate.

VOL. IX. SUNBEAM, RED LAKE COUNTY, MINNESOTA, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1909. NO. 31.

EDUCATORS JUNKET

TWENTY IN DELEGATION THAT WILL INSPECT SCHOOL SYSTEMS.

SUPERINTENDENTS OF 12 STATES

University of Minnesota Engages Attention of the Party, Which Is Investigating Rural School Conditions.

Minneapolis.—The city of Minneapolis was host to 20 of the most prominent educators of the country, including the state superintendents of 12 Southern states, besides Dr. Winship, of Boston, and Rolla C. Ogden, of New York, who made the trip possible for the others.

The party is on a tour of the leading educational institutions of the west, and northwest. Rural school conditions are also being carefully studied. The two special cars are carrying the visitors.

In the morning some little time was given to the St. Paul public school system. Most of the day, however, was spent in Minneapolis. The visiting educators were escorted by Prof. J. L. Coulter, of the University of Minnesota, with the state agricultural college as the first objective point. The forenoon was spent in a thorough inspection of this institution and the visitors were taken to the university campus in the afternoon.

Late in the day all were taken on a sightseeing trip of Minneapolis in automobiles furnished by the Commercial club.

Friday was spent at Menominee, Wis., on an inspection of the Trinity Stout Industrial school. The University of Wisconsin at Madison will claim their attention on the day following. After that the party will start south again.

In the party are:

Dr. Wickliffe Rose, Nashville, agent Peabody fund; Dr. P. P. Claxton, Universit of Tennessee, Knoxville; R. C. Stearns, Richmond, representing the Virginia state superintendent; Luther Holloway, representing his father, William M. Holloway, state superintendent of Florida, and the following state superintendents: H. C. Gunnels, Alabama; George B. Cook, Arkansas; Jere M. Pound, Georgia; J. C. Crabbe, Kentucky; T. H. Harris, Louisiana; J. N. Powers, Mississippi; J. Y. Joyner, North Carolina; J. E. Swearingen, Soupth Carolina; R. L. Jones, Tennessee; R. B. Cousins, Texas.

MAYOR STANDS BY CHIEF.

St. Cloud's Municipal Teapot Continues to Boil.

St. Cloud. — The second step in the municipal cleanup movement was taken by Mayor Hugh Evans, when he demanded the resignation of Patrolman William H. Gish. Gish, it is charged, had not hesitated to criticize Mayor Evans and Chief John Quinlivan.

This quasi removal, following so closely upon the heels of the removal of Police Sergeant Brick, is taken to mean that Mayor Evans is determined to keep John Quinlivan in office as chief of police in spite of the remonstrances of several citizens who, at a recent indignation meeting, demanded his removal. The action against Quinlivan grew out of his alleged negligence to arrest, or cause the arrest, of Frank Sullivan and Lindsay Garlock, implicated in the Swintek assault. Sergeant Brick published an affidavit directed against his chief, and his removal followed. Patrolman Gish apparently did not profit by his superior's misfortune, but continued to criticize the city's executive and the chief of police.

MINNESOTA A TOB CCO STATE.

St. Paul. — Tobacco growing gives promise of becoming a common and profitable industry in Minnesota, according to Professor C. P. Bull, of the Minnesota farm school and experiment station, who says the industry is not new in this state.

Last spring, he says, the station distributed plants to farmers who were willing to give attention to the culture, and that all the crops so far reported are good. Most of the tobacco was grown in Sherburne county. Minnesota has a good soil for tobacco, he says, and good profits await all those who will give time and patience to the cultivation of plants.

E. Heibel, of Sherburne county, last year sold 8,400 pounds of tobacco to cigar manufacturers who wanted it for filler. This year Professor Bull says, Heibel has a larger crop and it is in better condition. In another year Professor Bull expects to see the tobacco industry prominent in the states' list of resources.

INAUGURAL DAY AT CARLETON.

Dr. Cowling Now President—Governor Eberhart and Cyrus Northrop Present.

Northfield, Minn.—The formal inauguration of Donald John Cowling, Ph. D., D. D., as president of Carleton college, at Norfield, took place under favorable auspices and amid great enthusiasm. At the same service the degree of doctor of divinity was conferred upon Rev. Marion Roy Burton, Ph. D., president-elect, of Smith college.

The morning trains brought several coachloads of alumni and friends of the institution, and many others had arrived for the preaching services.

After special morning prayer at Willis hall chapel, the inaugural procession started from Laird hall across the campus to the Congregational church. The line was brilliant with purple and red, the doctors' robes, worn by the distinguished visitors and faculty members, and with the various class colors.

The freshman class led with robes of red and white, followed by the sophomores with green and white, the juniors carrying red and white and the seniors appearing in cap and gown, with chrysanthemum bouttenieres. Next in the stately procession were the alumni, members of the faculty in cap and gown, and the members of the Minnesota Congregational Association. At the rear were Governor A. O. Eberhart with President Cyrus Northrop, of the University of Minnesota; W. H. Laird, of Winona, with David P. Jones, of Minneapolis, and President Emeritus J. W. Strong, of Carleton, with President Cowling. At the church door the students formed a double line through which the dignitaries passed in.

WORSTED BY FARMER.

Attacked on Lonely Road He Grapples With Hold-up Man.

Minneapolis, Minn.—With a bullet in his head and spirited team of horses to control, Peter Smith, a farmer living in Plymouth township, fought and subdued a hold-up man who tried to rob him while he was on his way home from Minneapolis. The would-be robber made his escape, but not until Smith's team had become frightened and claimed all his attention.

Smith had reached a lonely place about two miles north of Keegan's lake when he discovered that he was not alone in the wagon. Just as he turned he was confronted by a tall stranger with a huge revolver in his hand. Smith made for him.

Without taking chances in a personal encounter, the thug fired his gun twice. One of the shots took effect in Smith's head. Smith dropped the lines and grappled with his assailant. The highwayman finally gave up.

Smith's team became frightened and started to run away. Smith had to relinquish his hold on his prisoner, who rolled off the wagon and disappeared.

Smith hurried to Dr. I. C. McDonald, where his wound was dressed. An automobile carrying four police officers hastened to the scene, but no trace of the robber was found. The search will be continued.

LEADS GRAIN PRODUCERS.

U. S. Census Figures Show Big Crops.

St. Paul. — Minnesota is blessed above its neighbor states, in production of grain, as shown in a report just issued by the state immigration department, reviewing and comparing the crop situation in 10 central and northwestern states. The figures were taken from the United States government crop report for Oct. 1, 1909.

The comparison shows Minnesota first in wheat yield, with North Dakota a close second. The average yield in the North Star state was 16.5 bushels per acre. Wisconsin leads with an average of 19, but the total production was very small, hardly one-fiftieth of the Minnesota crop. This state is also first in production of barley.

Minnesota leads in average yield per acre in rye and hay, and is also first in condition of crops on Oct. 1, 1909 of corn, clover seed, Canada peas, tomatoes and grapes. This state is second on condition of crops of millet, potatoes and apples.

The hay yield here was 1,622 with an average of 1.75. Iowa and Illinois lead in yield with 5,910 and 4,135 respectively. The Minnesota rye yield was 1.748 with an average of 19. Michigan leads in yield with 5,874, but with an average of only 15.5.

Predicts a Revolution.

Minneapolis, Minn.—Carl M. Melom, instructor in Spanish at the university, predicts the downfall of Alfonso, the present incumbent of the throne of Spain, and says he is surprised that the socialist party had not already taken the country by storm. Mr. Melom went through Spain four years ago and devoted his time to a study of social conditions.

TRAGEDY IN BANK'S CRASH

CASHIER KILLS SELF AND WIFE'S MOTHER FALLS DEAD.

F. E. Hanscome of Mineral Point Commits Suicide on Grave to End Financial Troubles.

Mineral Point, Wis.—The body of F. E. Hanscome, cashier of the wrecked First National bank of this city, was found Monday resting on the grave of his mother in the family plot of the local cemetery, he having ended his life by shooting.

Mrs. John Gray, aged 80, mother-in-law of the dead banker, and to whose home Hanscome's body was removed, dropped dead when her son-in-law's body was brought in.

Hanscome had been missing for several hours, but no alarm was expressed until inqury at the bank and various other places about town failed to reveal his whereabouts.

A searching party was finally organized with the result that the body of the dead banker was found lying over the grave of his mother.

Hanscome was 55 years old and had been despondent for some time past. He was never known to take a vacation. He leaves a widow and two grown daughters, one a teacher in a public school at Milwaukee and the other a student at the Milwaukee Normal school.

Hanscome's heavy losses and worry over the fact that he had told depositors shortly before the bank failed that he was all right are said to be responsible for his act.

The dead cashier had been connected with the First National bank since its organization in 1884, antedating Vice-President Allen in point of service. He began as bookkeeper and teller, and carried much of the bank's responsibility on his shoulders. He had a reputation of strict honesty.

FOUND DRIFTING IN BOAT

Chicago Man Is Picked Up Helpless in the Lake Near Holland, Mich.

Holland, Mich. — Unable to speak coherently because of exhaustion, George Scheibstein of Chicago was found 40 miles off this harbor by the steamer Puritan. The man had been drifting longer than 12 hours in a disabled launch.

Scheibstein said that he started from Chicago for Whitehall, Mich., in his 25-foot boat. Far out in the lake, with a heavy sea running, the engine stopped and the sailor found his gasoline tank empty. When sighted by the Puritan the craft was nearly submerged. Scheibstein left for Chicago last night.

Recently the man died and his will gives his property to her.

FIFTY SUSPECTS ARRESTED

Efforts Are Being Made to Clear Up Shooting of Italian by Alleged "Black Hands."

Chicago.—Fifty arrests were made by the police in efforts to clear up the shooting of Salvatore Pinello, who was followed to Chicago from a hospital in Streator, Ill., where he had lain three months after being shot by agents of the Black Hand, and was shot a second time at Milton avenue and Oak street. Clews in possession of detectives, according to Inspector P. D. O'Brien, were expected to lead to the capture of Salvatore and Stefano Uttida, brothers, who were accused of the crime by Pinello.

Pinello was wounded the second time with a shotgun. Physicians at the Passavant hospital, to which he was taken, held out little hope for his recovery. His body was full of shot.

The shooting of Pinello was the sixth charged to the Black Hand society within a year.

Pinello told the police that he came to this country three years ago from Italy and went to Streator, where he was a section hand for the Santa Fe railroad.

The sufferer had not been in the town long when the Uttida brothers, who were in Chicago, began to write him threatening letters demanding money.

"We will tell the police that you are a member of the Black Hand society unless money is sent us," was written in one letter.

The threats continued and Pinello became desperate. He threatened to call on the police to arrest the men annoying him. The following day he was shot near his home. He remained in the hospital at Streator three months.

Pinello told the police at that time that the Uttida brothers had shot him.

SENATOR M'CARREN IS DEAD

New York Democratic Leader Dies in Brooklyn Hospital as Result of Operation for Appendicitis.

New York.—State Senator Patrick Henry McCarren, for many years leader of the Democratic party in Brooklyn and a power in state and national politics, died shortly after one o'clock this morning. The end came at St. Elizabeth's hospital, Brooklyn, the patient never having completely rallied from the effects of an operation performed for appendicitis, which was performed on October 12. His death was not unexpected; in fact, the senator himself realized throughout the afternoon and the earlier part of the night that his end was near.

INDIA STORM KILLS 10,000

Houses and Temples in Many Towns and Villages Causing Great Loss of Life.

London.—Dispatches from Calcutta say 10,000 persons have perished in a terrific storm which has swept the plains in the delta of the Ganges and Brahmaputra, in Bengal, India.

The storm followed the close of the rainy season—from June to September—and destroyed towns and villages in an area of 187,327 square miles, which have a population of 400 persons to the square mile.

The loss of life was occasioned mainly by the collapse of houses and temples in the towns and villages and by the river wrecks.

PUT WALSH IN CELL

FEDERAL ATTORNEYS PLAN TO TAKE BANKER TO PRISON SOON.

ASK COURT FOR A MANDATE

Defendant's Attorney and Government Counsel Make Plans for Final Test of Convicted Financier's Case—Ready for High Court.

Chicago.—If the plans of the government attorneys are sustained John R. Walsh, the convicted banker, may be taken to the federal prison at Fort Leavenworth soon.

District Attorney Sims and Attorney John S. Miller, representing Walsh, appeared in the circuit court of appeals Friday to argue the question of the $50,000 bonds on which Walsh is now at liberty.

Mr. Sims urged that this bond be set aside and that a mandate be issued at once ordering Walsh to be taken to the federal prison.

Attorney Miller urged that the present bonds be ordered to hold until the question of an appeal to the supreme court was decided.

Final arguments on the point will be heard within a few days. If Mr. Sims is sustained Mr. Walsh may be taken to Fort Leavenworth.

The action was begun by John S. Miller, chief counsel for the convicted president of the defunct Chicago Natnonal bank and the Equitable Trust Company. After the proceedings Mr. Miller admitted that the Walsh case would be carried to the supreme court on a writ of certiorari.

District Attorney Sims and Assistant District Attorney Childs were present with Mr. Miller at the secret session. Neither would reveal what transpired in court. Attorney Miller took the same position.

PERISH ON MOJAVE DESERT

Man, Woman and Three Children Believed to Have Died from Thirst While Crossing Waste.

San Bernardino, Cal.—Somewhere along the ancient trails of the Mojave desert a man and his wife and their three children are dead or dying. Who they are or what led them to attempt to cross the desert is not known, but their trail has revealed a pitiable story, and searching parties are searching for them in a race against death.

T. H. Kellogg, a rancher, was riding over the Carisho creek country Thursday when he came across the tracks of two teams. The trails indicated to his experienced eye that the drivers were lost. He followed the trail for some distance and came up with a camp wagon and a buggy and farther away a horse dying of thirst.

Pressing on he discovered the tracks of a man and a woman and three children. Uneven at times, retreating and wavering, as though the travelers did not know which way to turn, the footprints on the sand told of the search for water against a desperately growing need.

Sometimes the trail of one or the other children disappeared, indicating that the father or the mother had carried their dying offspring. The tracks followed the bed of a dry creek for miles, and then led to the country from which few travelers return.

Kellogg returned to civilization and searching parties were sent out.

SIX KILLED IN COLLISION

Number Persons Injured on Pennsylvania Road When Fast Passenger and Freight Trains Collide.

Richmond, Ind.—Killed, E. G. Webb, Richmond, fireman, arm torn off, crushed.

C. A. Johnson, Eaton, O., mail clerk, found under mail car.

C. O. Raines, Kokomo, Ind., mail clerk, cut to pieces.

Lewis Marshall, Richmond, Ind., engineer of freight train.

R. H. Hatfield, Greensfork, Ind., mail clerk, death due to burns and cuts.

Elmer Brown, Logansport, Ind., passenger engineer, cut and scalded.

Six persons were killed, and a number injured in a head-on collision which took place Friday at Collinsville, O., about twenty-five miles southeast of Richmond on the Pennsylvania railroad. The train wrecked was the flyer from Chicago to Cincinnati, No. 18, which leaves here about four o'clock. The train which was going at the rate of 50 miles an hour ran into an open switch on to a siding, colliding head-on with freight No. 75. The impact was so great that both engines were completely wrecked, freight cars were strewn along the road and smashed into fragments. The mail car was completely wrecked, being telescoped with the baggage car, the express car and the smoker were derailed.

In the smoker there were fifteen or twenty who were slightly injured.

Try This in November.

Thousands upon thousands of families who have not been regular eaters of Quaker Oats will begin on the first of November and eat Quaker Oats once or twice every day for thirty days of this month; the result in good health and more strength and vigor will mean that every other month in the year will find them doing the same thing.

Try it! Serve Quaker Oats plentifully and frequently for the thirty days of November and leave off a corresponding amount of meat and greasy foods. You'll get more health, more vigor and strength than you ever got in thirty days of any other kind of eating.

While you are trying this see that the children get a full share.

Quaker Oats is packed in regular size packages and large size family packages. 7

Prefers Return To Congress.

Congressman Halvor Steenerson, in replying to the insinuation of the Bemidji Sentnal that the Ninth district congressman might have aspirations for the governor's chair, had this to say.

"I want to say decisively that I am not now, nor ever have been and will not be a candidate for governor of Minnesota. I am a candidate for re election as congressman and nothing else at the present time.

"I make this statement without reservation and I want all my friends to know it."—Thirteen Towns,

We often wonder if candidates for office ever stop to consider the differance in the expense of a newspapers support and that of an individual. When an individual tells a candidate for office that he will support him it don't cost the said individual one cent, and he can go right on doing his ordinary work until election day, then go and vote. But how is it with the newspaper publisher? Well as soon as he promises to support a candidate the said candidate will expect to see a great long article in the next issue of the paper telling all about his good qualities, and hinting that his opponent is a rascal, that should not be supported for any office. Then there is the other feature to be considered so far as the newspaper is concerned which is: No matter which side of a controversy a newsper is, his opponents are, as a rule running around telling all they meet that the newspaper has sold out to the other fellow, and sometimes the candidate you are supporting is of the opinion that they have bought the whole printing plant and the good will of the editor, if they pay $5,00 for publishing their political announcement. But it is not so with the individual. They in the estimation of the public have a perfect right to their opinion, but while they are expressing it to one the newspaper is speaking to hundreds and thousands.

Wagg—Well, when you light one of them you instinctively look around for the corned beef.—Exchange.

Strictly Business.

"Who presented the count to you?" asked the privileged friend.

"No one," answered the heiress. "I bought him."—Lippincott's.

How Attraction Acts.

Attraction acts very curiously. Thus if there were a man in the moon and if he were like the men on the earth he would be able to leap over a three storied house with as much ease as an ordinary jumper springs over a three foot fence in consequence of the forces of attraction being much less at the moon's surface than at the earth's. An elephant there would be as light footed as the deer here. A boy throwing stones might easily land them in an adjoining county. On the other hand, the reverse of all this would happen in Jupiter or Saturn. They being so much greater than the earth, their attraction would so impede locomotion that a man would scarcely be able to crawl, and large animals would be crushed by their own weight.

In the Land of Windmills.

The Dutch when they invite you, and they are not a guest seeking race, are extremely hospitable and make you at once welcome. Sometimes, however, when it comes to dinner, their active hospitality demands an energetic recognition. The table is laid with piles of plates before each chair. On your first visit the spoons and forks are heavy silver, the knives of the finest steel and ivory. You never, however, eat with them again. When you have been shown that a family possesses them that ends it. You eat thereafter from everyday ware.

"What would the silver be like for our descendants if we used it often?" an old lady asked me. "What would we have if our ancestors had been careless?"—Eva Madden in Harper's Bazar.

A Curiosity In Boundaries.

About 600 yards from the station at Herseaux, at the crossroads from Oudenarde to Roubaix, on the way from Tournai to Mouseron, there is a directing post which from a topographical point of view is a curiosity. This post marks the separation between the two countries, France and Belgium; three provinces or departments, Le Nord, western Flanders and Hainault; three bishoprics, Cambrai, Burges and Tournai. Three races dwell around it, speaking three languages, French, Flemish and Wallon. It is also in three communes, Wattrelos, Herseaux and Estaimpius.—London Globe.

The Only Way to Know.

Catherine had asked so many questions, and father was growing impatient. Finally he said, "Oh, Catherine I can't answer half your questions."

"I know you can't, father, but then I do not know which half you can't answer."—Delineator.

Neither Polite Nor Wise.

Mrs. Tellit—It isn't polite to turn your back on people.

Tellit—It isn't wise, either, unless you are sure that your dress is buttoned to the limit. Think that over!—Chicago News.

Sanitary instruction is more important than sanitary legislation.—Derby.

A Nice Bird.

"Do you like a nice bird?" asked the host as they sat down to the table.

"Oh, yes!" responded the guest immediately and enthusiastically.

"You ought to call on my sister," explained the other. "She's got one of the finest canaries you ever saw. Well, what kind of a sandwich do you think you can eat?"—London Telegraph.

An Arbitrary Classification.

"So you think every patriot has a more or less clearly defined ambition to hold public office?"

"Yes," answered Senator Sorghum. "As a rule, patriots may be divided into two classes—the appointed and the disappointed."—Washington Star.

Badly Expressed.

"For heaven's sake, be careful with that rifle, man!" exclaimed a musketry instructor. "You just missed me that time."

"Did I, sergeant? I'm awfully sorry!" responded the indifferent marksman.—London Fun.

It Quieted Mother.

The house was all paid for. Mother was exultant, jubilant, reiterative. "Say, mother," burst out six-year-old Paul eagerly, "print it on your cards, mother, print it on your cards!"—Delineator.

The Usual Thing.

"What's the proper thing at a wedding?"

"Wish the pair happiness and tell everybody else there's no earthly chance for it."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

She—It is a woman's lot to suffer in silence.

He—I should put it differently.

It Didn't Work Out Just Right.

I saw the best of intentions become a veritable boomerang on Broadway the other night. A policeman had arrested for some small disturbance two well dressed men who had evidently had too much, but were facing the inevitable trip to the station without any further fuss. A friend saw their plight and rushed up.

"Officer," he piped in a peculiarly effeminate voice, "I beg that you will not arrest these men. Why, they are no more drunk than I am."

"Oh, very well," said the cop. "I'll take you too."

And he did.—New York Telegraph.

The African Buffalo.

A wounded buffalo is vastly more dangerous when he runs away than when he charges, for in nine cases out of ten after a dash that may be for a few hundred yards or a mile he will revengefully circle back to an interception of his own trail, stand hidden in grass or thicket until his pursuer comes plodding along the trail and then charge upon him. Despite the fierce temper of a lone bull, his savage cunning and his great, charging bulk, I believe him much less dangerous than the lion, for he has far less speed, lacks the lion's poisoned claws and is a much bigger target. This opinion is substantiated by the indisputable fact that at least ten men are killed or mauled by lion to one killed by buffalo.—Edgar Beecher Bronson in Century.

The Temple of Zeus.

All that remains of the great temple of Zeus, which was 700 years in building, is to be found about 150 yards from the foot of the Acropolis at Athens. The ruins consist of sixteen columns of the Corinthian order, six and one-half feet in diameter and sixty feet high. It was the second largest temple erected by the Greeks, one superior to it in size being the temple of Diana at Ephesus. According to a legend, its foundation was built by Dukalion, the Greek Noah, who from this point witnessed the waters of the flood subside. An opening in the ground is said to be the orifice through which the flood disappeared.

Amended.

In a book of musical criticism the author alluded in flattering terms to the works of his friend Herr Q. Unfortunately during the printing of the volume the two friends quarreled. Then the offended author had inserted in each copy of the book a slip of paper with the following note: "Erratum, page 94, line 21, for 'Herr Q., the eminent composer and distinguished musician,' read 'Herr Q., the pretentious violinist and impudent and clumsy plagiarist!' "—London Mail.

Testing Dear Little Fido's Milk.

"Algy, dear," remarked a young wife to her husband, "I wish you would taste this milk and see if it is perfectly sweet. If it's the least bit sour I mustn't give any of it to dear little Fido!"—London Tit-Bits.

A Cod Liver Oil Fiend.

"When I was anaemic," said a pale man, "I took cod liver oil. I had a careless habit of leaving the oil uncorked, and it began to disappear. Some one was drinking it. There was a cod liver oil fiend in the house. I decided to trap the thief," he went on, gazing thoughtfully at his large white feet, "and one night I purposely drank two cups of black coffee so as to keep awake. Gentlemen, you will hardly believe what happened. The thief was a rat—a big, sleek, fat rat. The oil, I guess, had agreed with him. As I watched him from the bed he leaped silently on to the bureau, dipped his tail in the bottle, lifted it out and licked it clean, and then dipped and licked it again and again till a good two inches of the oil was gone."—Exchange.

Olden Tea Table Etiquette.

Tea table etiquette was somewhat complicated in the days of that "hardened and shameless tea drinker," Dr. Johnson, when many people thought nothing of drinking ten or twelve cups at a sitting. It was considered proper for the cups and saucers of a party of tea drinkers to be all passed up to the hostess in one batch when replenishment was considered necessary, and in order that each person might be sure of getting back the right cup the teaspoons were numbered. When the cups were passed up those who did not require any more were supposed to place the spoon in the cup. And this writer remembers a very ancient dame teaching a small boy to place his spoon in his cup after the first cup had been emptied. He wondered for the reason. Now he knows that tea was once very expensive, and little boys were not expected to ask again.—St. James' Gazette.

A Crusher.

A consequential little man entered the commercial room of a big hotel not long back and gave a vigorous pull at the bell. As no one answered he rang again more loudly than before. A maidservant then came in, and the following colloquy took place:

Servant—Who rang that bell?

Little Man (making most of his height)—I did.

Servant (scornfully)—And who lifted you up to it?—London Telegraph

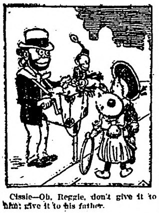
How About This Story?

The Deer Park correspondent to the Erie Eleven Towns, of last week, raised a question that is likely to put some people to wondering why the Soo railroad went so far south. He says:

"Can anyone tell us what object the Soo had in view when they changed their starting point from Thief River Falls to Plummer instead? Was it because they they thought that they was going to protect Thief River Falls ant give no new towns the chance to cut up the territory belonging to them so far? But whether they done so to please the citizins of Thief River Falls or done this as a matter of convenience to themselves, that we do not know, but what it does seem queer that they would cut in on their own territory and run the risk of leveing an opening for old Jim Hill, We want a road and want it bad and was in hopes we would get the Soo, but if we can't, why old "Jim" is welcome."

We quote the above, and it will be remembered that the new Soo folders gave the starting of their Duluth line from Thief River Falls, and there must have been some scientific "plugging" done to get them to stick to their old line of railroad until they got far enough south, so they would be sure to not cut into Thief River Falls territory, and Swanson has "let the cat out of the bag."

A Family Likeness.



Cissie—Oh, Reggie, don't give it to him; give it to his father.

Just Pleasantness.

Perhaps just pleasantness has not a very heroic sound, but the human heart that, knowing its own bitterness, can yet carry itself cheerfully is not without heroism. Indeed, if that human heart does no more than hold its tongue about its own aches and pains it has a certain moral value that the world cannot afford to lose. "Pleasantness" does not sound as well as self sacrifice or wisdom or spirituality, but it may include all these great words. And certainly just to start one's husband out to his work cheerily, to make the hobbledehoy of a son feel a gentler and sweeter sentiment toward women because of his own mother's sound, sweet gayety and strength, to help one's servants to put good humor and friendliness into their services—these things make for righteousness in the world.—Margaret Deland.

AFTER SUFFERING ONE YEAR

Cured by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Milwaukee, Wis. — "Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has made me a well woman, and I would like to tell the whole world of it. I suffered from female trouble and fearful pains in my back. I had the best doctors and they all decided that I had a tumor in addition to my female trouble, and advised an operation. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound made me a well woman and I have no more backache. I hope I can help others by telling them what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done for me." — Mrs. Emma Imse, 833 First St., Milwaukee, Wis.

The above is only one of the thousands of grateful letters which are constantly being received by the Pinkham Medicine Company of Lynn, Mass., which prove beyond a doubt that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, made from roots and herbs, actually does cure these obstinate diseases of women after all other means have failed, and that every such suffering woman owes it to herself to at least give Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a trial before submitting to an operation, or giving up hope of recovery.

Mrs. Pinkham, of Lynn, Mass., invites all sick women to write her for advice. She has guided thousands to health and her advice is free.

For Lame Back

An aching back is instantly relieved by an application of Sloan's Liniment.

This liniment takes the place of massage and is better than sticky plasters. It penetrates — without rubbing — through the skin and muscular tissue right to the bone, quickens the blood, relieves congestion, and gives permanent as well as temporary relief.

Here's the Proof.

Mr. James C. Lee, of 1100 9th St., S.E., Washington, D.C., writes: "Thirty years ago I fell from a scaffold and seriously injured my back. I suffered terribly at times; from the small of my back all around my stomach was just as if I had been beaten with a club. I used every plaster I could get with no relief. Sloan's Liniment took the pain right out, and I can now do as much ladder work as any man in the shop, thanks to

Sloan's Liniment

Mr. J. P. Evans, of Mt. Airy, Ga., says: "After being afflicted for three years with rheumatism, I used Sloan's Liniment, and was cured sound and well, and am glad to say I haven't been troubled with rheumatism since. My leg was badly swollen from my hip to my knee. One-half a bottle took the pain and swelling out."

Sloan's Liniment has no equal as a remedy for Rheumatism, Neuralgia or any pain or stiffness in the muscles or joints.

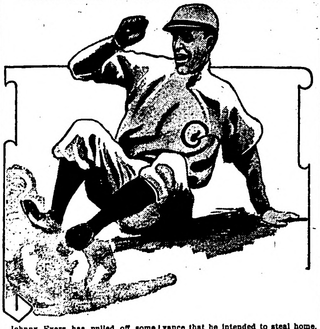
DARING SECOND BASEMAN OF THE CHICAGO CUBS.



Johnny Evers has pulled off some sensational stunts since he has been a member of the former champions of the world, the Chicago National league team, but few of them were more stirring than his steal of home in the first of the city championship games between the Cubs and White Sox. "Big Ed" Walsh was pitching for the Sox and Evers politely told him in advance that he intended to steal home. When Walsh wound up, Evers started for the plate. Walsh saw the Cubs' second sacker dashing homeward and threw to Sullivan. The throw was wide and Evers is shown in the picture hitting the plate feet first. The final score was 4 to 0, and the Cubs didn't need such daring work on Evers' part, but the man from Troy wanted to show that he could do it, and did.

GREATEST SEASON IN HISTORY OF BASEBALL

Total of 7,978,108 Persons Saw the Games—American League Again Outdraws Its Rival.

The 1909 season was the most successful the National and American leagues ever have known. A grand total of 7,978,108 persons witnessed the combined games of the two leagues. These figures are taken carefully from each individual city and after every game.

The American league again outdraw the National by 103,048, the grand total of the American being 3,740,570, while the National drew 3,637,538. In only three seasons since the American expanded east has the National outdrawn it, this being 1908, 1903 and 1901.

Both leagues increased their figures over last season, the American gaining 129,204, while the National showed an increase of 2,550. The close race up to the last few days had considerable to do with the large increase in the American, while Pittsburg led by a comfortable margin the major part of the National's season.

The New York Nationals again carried off the individual honors, drawing a total of 783,700, although they fell off more than 100,000 from the season before. Their average per game was 12,439. The Athletics of Philadelphia, with their mammoth new stands, finished second with a total of 674,915, drawing an average of 10,545 to a game. The Boston Americans were third with 668,965, and the Chicago Nationals fourth with 633,480.

The Athletics of Philadelphia had a banner year and broke all records for the Quaker City, drawing 219,853 more persons than in 1908 and 49,334 more than in 1907, their previous banner year. The Phillies, of whom much was expected, proved a great disappointment, which materially affected their attendance, and they fell off 117,483 from 1908. Four cities in the American, Philadelphia, Detroit, New York and Boston, and four in the National, Cincinnati, Pittsburg, St. Louis and Brooklyn, showed an increase, while Chicago, St. Louis, Cleveland and Washington in the American and New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and Boston in the National showed a decrease.

As a road team Manager Hughey Jennings' Detroit team had every other club beaten, drawing a grand total of 685,538, or an average of 9,093 to a game.

HILDRETH LEADS WINNERS

Westerner's Horses Have Taken More Than $153,000 in Purses in the East.

S. C. Hildreth leads the list of winning horse owners in the east with more than $153,000 to his credit.

Hildreth has won the largest amount of money with Joe Madden, who leads all earners with $49,905 to his credit. Next in the Hildreth barn comes King James with $38.235, standing third on the list. These colts were purchased by Hildreth from John E. Madden. Hildreth's next good winner is Fitz Herbert, believed by many to be the greatest racing tool of the year. He stands fifth on the list with $29,582 won. Firestone and Fayette are the others which have added to Hildreth's earnings materially. The former has a total of $9,055 won, but all of it did not go to Hildreth, as he only purchased the son of Royal Flush a short time ago.

James R. Keene gives credit to Sweep and Hilarious for most of his year's earnings. The former picked up $41,323, being the winner of the Futurity, which boosted his standing. He is a son of Ben Brush-Pink Domino. Hilarious is a son of Voter-Harpsichord and has won $36,585.

CHARLEY TAFT TO BE BOXER

President's Son Will Take Lessons from Jimmy Walsh, a Boston Pugilist.

Charley Taft, the youngest son of the president, will, in all probability, take lessons in boxing the coming winter from Jimmy Walsh, a Boston boxer.

Just when and where Jimmy will impart his knowledge of boxing to his pupil could not be ascertained, but it is thought that this will not be decided upon till after the president returns from his swing around the country. Charley now is attending school in a town in Connecticut.

Jimmy Walsh declined to be interviewed on the matter. From a reliable source, however, it was learned that the matter of obtaining Walsh's services first was taken up by the president in Washington a few days before the last congress adjourned, the Boston boy having been highly recommended as one who could amply fill the bill.

"Little black swellings were scattered over my face and neck and they would leave little black scars that would itch so I couldn't keep from scratching them. Larger swellings would appear and my clothes would stick to the sores. I went to a doctor, but the trouble only got worse. By this time it was all over my arms and the upper part of my body in swellings as large as a dollar. It was so painful that I could not bear to lie on my back. The second doctor stopped the swellings, but when they broke the places would not heal. I bought a set of the Cuticura Remedies and in less than a week some of the places were nearly well. I continued until I had used three sets, and now I am sound and well. The disease lasted three years. O. L. Wilson, Puryear, Tenn., Feb. 8, 1908."

Silk Stockings Indispensable.

Susan B. Anthony was a woman of simple taste in dress, but her close friends knew of one pretty feminine vanity she always held to. She had a weakness for silk stockings. Being pressed on one occasion for an explanation of what most women at one time regarded as an unnecessary extravagance, she laughingly exclaimed: "Oh, I just love 'em. They are an inspiration. If I have my silk stockings on when I rise to make an address, I feel just like I am walking among the clouds. They help me to soar away on flights of eloquence. I wouldn't be without them."

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven Catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only Constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials.

Mrs. Quilluser studied a moment, as if planning. "Dearest, Willie needs a pair of shoes more than Mary does the mittens. I have already promised them to the poor boy. Hadn't you better work on Willie's shoes first, dear?"

"All right, Nellie, all right," he replied kindly, turning his eyes up into Nellie's great patient ones.

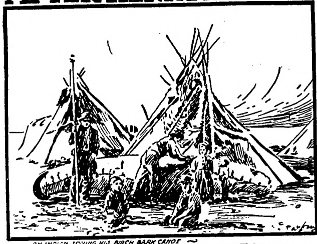
FAMOUS BAY NAMED AFTER HENRY HUDSON



AN INDIAN SEWING HIS BIRCH BARK CANOE

WHILE America has just finished celebrating the tercentenary of Henry Hudson, whose name it has immortalized in the Hudson river it is interesting to remember that Canada, too, has a permanent monument to his memory in the shape of Hudson's Bay, the Mecca of the fur-hunter. The geographical position of Canada causes it, together with Siberia, to be the chief fur-producing country in the world, for the wild beasts there are endowed by nature with the richest furs as protection against the extreme cold, and Hudson's Bay is the true center of the fur hunting-grounds, whence the hunters start, and whither they return with their precious spoils. We shall see in this article what immense resources are necessary, both in men and material, and what dangers and hardships have to be undergone to obtain these furs, the high price of which is thus naturally explained.

During the long winter months Hudson's Bay, which only communicates with the open sea by the long Hudson Strait to the north of Labrador, is cut off from the world; for this reason Revillon Freres have created towards the most central part of the bay, in the Strutton islands, a vast depot, where two steamers of their fleet bring huge quantities of every description of stores at the beginning of each summer, making their way through the drift-ice from Montreal to James Bay, and, arrived there, rapidly unloading their cargo. Once their spacious holds are emptied, they are reloaded with the precious furs, brought from all the posts dotted along the bay, and commence their return voyage to Montreal before the ice closes the only maritime route.

The grand depot at James Bay communicates with the posts by small steamships, such as the Violette and the steam-schooner Pourvoyeuse, whilst sailing barges of about ten tons are attached to the various posts, affording a means of communication along the coasts or up the rivers to the secondary posts and outposts. The chief posts are called base posts, and here are concentrated all the provisions for the ordinary posts, all their accounts and their collections of skins, leathers, oils, walrus teeth (ivory), etc. The ordinary posts, installed further inland, serve as go-betweens for the base posts, and the outposts, or flying posts, opened temporarily under the direction of a half-breed or an Indian, establish direct contact with the hunters and trappers.

The European agents, located at the base posts or in the ordinary posts, usually remain for three years in the solitudes. The climate is healthy, although very severe in the winter, and sickness is rare. Under the orders of this staff are numerous auxiliaries, either Canadians (the old wood-rangers) or natives, half-breeds, Indians and Eskimos.

The ranger is gradually disappearing, this wandering, exciting and entirely independent life, with its perpetual struggle against the elements, wild beasts and men, no longer tempting the bolder and more adventurous spirits. They are succeeded by their children, however, who are half-breeds, and are more intelligent than the Indians. These are usefully employed in the posts, or even take charge occasionally of an outpost. Up to the fiftieth degree of latitude north—that is to say, the southern limit of Hudson's Bay—an abundant supply of furs is brought to the posts by the Indians. They are cunning hunters, but, unfortunately, often lazy, and suffer much from the ravages of consumption, to which their degenerate frames oppose but a poor resistance.

The game, of course, varies, as the Indian either hunts the woods on foot or the rivers in the canoe; the sable, mink, ermine, fisher, red and silver fox, lynx, wolf, beaver, musquash, otter, bear, wolverine, elk and musk-ox give him plenty of opportunities of doing business with the posts.

The Eskimos are extremely brave and hardy, sharp at business, and, above all, excellent sailors. They derive great assistance on the vast plains of snow from their dogs, attached to the sledges, which they use for transport purposes. At the head of each team is the pilot dog, an excellent animal with keen scent, who leads the caravan, acts as a guide, and avoids crevasses and bad places. They are fed on fish, are large in size, and have long, thick hair, and pass their nights howling or fighting amongst each other beneath the clear wintry sky of the Polar regions.

White fox is rare game, while the white bear is a formidable adversary, who must be shot from a distance, and who frequently attacks the hunters, should he be only slightly wounded. The most productive and the least dangerous animal to hunt, although great hardships have to be undergone, is the hair-seal, or phoque. This animal, when the thaw comes, congregates on the dislodged icebergs in shoals of 20,000 to 30,000 at a time. The young animals (the most valuable) can oppose no resistance to their slayers. In most cases the only weapon used is a club; a vigorous blow on the nose of a hair-seal is sufficient to kill it at once. The older animals, however, who occasionally attack the hunters, and weigh from 14 to 16 cwt., have to be killed by a rifle bullet.

The slaughtered animals are cut up then and there, and the skins and the blubber only are dragged to the camps, and thence sold to the outposts, who forward them to the Strutton islands.

Black bear are very numerous in all parts of the country; they grow to a large size and carry finer pelts than in any other part of the American continent. I saw a skin which had been killed in the previous spring that was well over eight feet, a very large size for this species. Some of these bears have a large white patch on the chest, others have only a small white spot, while in most cases the general pelage is a rich glossy black all over. On the Upper Stikine there is a local variety which has at all times smoke grey hair over the whole of the back. It is only a local variety and not a subspecies, since cubs may be seen with the mother, who is often jet black all over. The general habits of the black bear are so well known that I need only say a few words as they apply to the animal in Cassiar. In this district they leave their hibernating holes early in May, and if the weather is bad return to them until the young grass springs up on the hillsides. Here they feed greedily for a month, and are generally in poor condition, but in fine fur. At this season the Indians hunt them a little and kill a few, for whose hides they get about $15.

Gossip of Washington

What Is Going On at the National Capital.

Machine Counts Uncle Sam's Money

COUNTING MACHINE

WASHINGTON.—Uncle Sam is now too big, too prosperous and too much in a hurry even to count his money, and instead of counting his coins by hand he simply runs them through a sort of hopper, operated by electricity, and an automatic register shows how many go through. The coins fall into a bag and are tied up and sealed, the government guaranteeing that the correct number are in the bag.

The machine can make no mistake, hence Uncle Sam feels safe in making his guaranty. In this way all the money is now being counted out at Washington, to go to the subtreasuries and banks throughout the country. The treasury does a great deal of counting of money, and for the purpose women are employed rather than men, as it has been found after long experience that the women make fewer mistakes. Hence the operators who sit at the electric machines and pour the silver stream into the hoppers are of the female sex.

But there is one place in the life of the coin where it must be counted by hand, and that is when it comes back to the treasury for redemption.

The money then must be gone over by hand to separate the foreign, mutilated, worn out and counterfeit pieces, a work that requires very quick precision, and women have been found to do it exceedingly well. Usually they can detect a counterfeit coin by its color as it lies among the others on the table, but if not then, the operator captures it when she tosses it from one hand to another, for there is a false ring in its chink as it leaps into her palm.

Friends Amused by Taft Bath Story

BATHS
THE WATER'S FINE

WASHINGTON has a good laugh at the story from Glenwood Springs, Col., about the bath President Taft didn't take, knowing how the people do some awfully funny things in their efforts to entertain the nation's chief. At Glenwood Springs, on his trip west, which station he reached at six o'clock in the morning, there were several thousand people who greeted the stoppage of the train with a whoop. Cap. "Allie" Butts, the president's military aid, landed on the floor with one bound from the bed, and speedily appeared upon the rear platform of the train, wrapped in a military coat and not much else, excepting just straight mad. His cream-colored pajamas projected about a foot below the great coat and his shoes displayed the lack of hosiery as he faced the reception committee, headed by the bishop of the church and the mayor of Glenwood Springs. He informed them that the president would be out presently, and then, as the mountain breezes were spreading his coat-tails out so that you could play checkers on them, he hiked to summon the presidential valet. The president finally appeared on the platform, and explained smilingly but hastily that his program hadn't any notice of a six o'clock reception. The crowd stated that whether it did or didn't he was there, and they were going to have him, and off they rushed him to the Glenwood Springs hotel to show him the wonderful public bath with the town's famous warm springs. Now, a bath before breakfast is a very pleasurable thing to take, but the way the president was to take this did not suit him in the least. The thoughtful people of Glenwood had prepared a specially-constructed bathing suit for the president, and a dozen or so for the members of the party, and the program was that the president was to patter down into the pool on one side, while the multitude watched from the other side. The president positively declined this courtesy, and reluctantly the people of Glenwood Springs gave up their promised presidential pleasure.

Odd Provisions in Old Mail Rules

RULES
U.S. MAIL

A GENERAL clean-up of the records of the postoffice department in Washington recently brought to light a list of postal routes existing in the United States in 1809, together with a schedule of the time in which those routes should be covered. The pamphlets were issued by Gideon Granger, who was postmaster general under Jefferson in 1801 and continued under Madison in 1809. They are the earliest records of their kind now in the possession of the department.

In front of each pamphlet is a list of the rules and regulations which governed the distribution of the mails just 100 years ago. They were brief and to the point, and contained some curious stipulations. In addition, the pamphlet contained fines levied upon mail carriers for delivering wet mails and for other shortcomings.

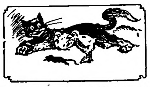
The general rules were as follows:

"1. The postmaster general may expedite the mails and after the time of arrival and departure at any time during the continuance of the contracts, he stipulating what he conceives to be an adequate compensation for any extra expense that may be occasioned thereby.

"2. Fifteen minutes shall be allowed for opening and closing the mails at all offices where no particular time is specified.

"3. For every 30 minutes delay (unavoidable accidents excepted) in arriving after the time prescribed in any contract, the contractor shall forfeit $1; and if the delay continues until the departure of any depending mail whereby the mails destined for such depending mail lost a trip, an additional forfeiture of $5."

Chickens Adopted by a Police Cat



THE police of the tenth precinct in Washington have as a mascot a cat that is destined to disturb the rest of the enemies of the so-called nature fakers. This cat, a large, well-trained animal, and the pride of every member of the command, has adopted two foundling chickens of tender age. Strage though it may seem, she cares for them with an eye as guarding as a mother hen ever possessed, and is apparently determined that no harm shall befall them.

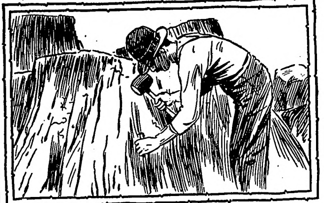
The two little bundles of feathers are supposed to have been brought into the station house one exceedingly rainy night. At the time they were but a few days old. During the afternoon before they were seen in the vicinity of the station house, but when it started to rain they disappeared. From time to time their pitiful chirps could be heard, and as night came on these increased in frequency and plaintiveness. The chirps came from under a stable.

Members of the precinct command say that during the evening the cat appeared to be acting strangely. Instead of roaming about the squad room, as was her usual custom, she wandered about the rooms on the lower floor of the station, and occasionally made visits to the basement. No significance was given her queer actions, but many of the policemen wondered why their feline mascot did not visit them and get her usual evening pettings.

The next morning the cause of the cat's strange actions was explained, when the strange little bundles of feathers were discovered, but within a few minutes she put in her appearance.

She immediately started to attend to her motherly duties. The little fellows were true to their adopted mother from the very first.

FORTUNES IN FAST-VANISHING WALNUT



PREPARING STUMP FOR VENEER

ONE day recently a man in a buggy stopped at a farm in eastern Jackson county, Kansas, hitched his horse to the fence and climbed over into a field where several big stumps protruded from the plowed earth. He bent over the stumps and examined them closely. Then he crossed another fence into another field and examined some walnut trees that grew there.

A few minutes later he went to the farmhouse and was talking to the owner. He told the farmer that he was buying walnut timber, and that there were a half dozen trees in the walnut grove on his place that he would like to buy. They agreed upon a price and then the stranger said:

"Now, I'll give you $10 more for those three stumps in the plowed field and will dig them out for you and carry them away."

The farmer snapped at the proposition. For 40 years he had been plowing around those massive stumps and a thousand times he had "cussed" when the point of his plow or a corner of his harrow had caught them. He had an idea that the man who offered to dig them out and give him $10 into the bargain must be a little bit insane, but, anyway, he was glad to get rid of them.

A few days later three men came to the farm and cut down the walnut trees and dug out the three old stumps and hauled them all away.

One of those old stumps was worth $300. The others were worth not much more than the expense of digging them up and hauling them to Kansas City.

The stumps came to the mill of a walnut corporation on the bank of the Blue river near Sheffield. There the stumps will be trimmed and steamed for hours and then fastened into a veneer machine, where they will revolve against the cutting edge of a great knife that will slice off a thin veneer as the stump turns.

This veneer will be used for covering pianos, the finest kinds of furniture and cabinet work, and the inside finish of railroad cars.

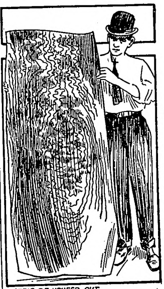
This one stump was particularly valuable because of the wrinkles and burls and warts that ran through it. The veneer sliced from it would have a beautiful waving grain with bird's-eyes and all sorts of curious convolutions. The more of these a veneer has the more valuable it is.

There is not one walnut stump in a hundred that is worth anything to the veneer mills. There is not one in a thousand that is worth $300. And there is not one man in a million who knows the value of a stump by looking at it in the ground. The men who do know this and who spend their time looking for these stumps are called "cruisers." They drive all over the states of Missouri and Kansas looking for walnut timber and stumps that are good for veneer.

The men who buy these stumps and cut them say that stumps of young trees are of no value. The best ones are of trees centuries old. The more aged and gnarled the tree the richer the stump will be in burls and bird's-eyes. Some of the most valuable stumps are of trees that were cut 50 years ago by the pioneers of this country. The best of them are found along the rivers, where the lands were too rough to be cultivated. From these tracts the trees were cut for lumber or firewood and the stumps remained to be dug up a half century later and used to decorate some parlor in a modern house.

The men who cut these stumps into veneer do not always get them for a small price. Many farmers know their value and demand it. In the yard of the mill near Sheffield are stumps for which the owners paid from $50 to $[illegible]00 and there is one for which the man who dug it out demands $300. This stump is nine feet in diameter at the butt of the tree.

This mill has been sawing walnut lumber for 15 years. In that time it has cut 90,000,000 feet of walnut lumber, the greater part of which has been sent to Europe. But shipments have gone from here to Australia, Russia and China.



STRIP OF VENEER CUT

Now the sawing of walnut into lumber is to be abandoned and the mill will cut only veneers. The reason is that nearly all the large walnut timber has been cut. There is plenty of small walnut timber in Missouri and Kansas, but it does not pay to cut it, the black heart is too small and the white sap is of no value. It is the black heart of the tree that has the fine grain and takes the rich, black polish.

Owing to the scarcity of big walnut logs and the small lumber that has gone to the European market in recent years, the demand for it has fallen off and it has been supplanted by mahogany.

There are other reasons why mahogany has taken the place of walnut. Mahogany is 30 per cent. cheaper in Europe than walnut. It is much larger, too. Walnut logs from which segments four inches thick may be cut are scarce, and walnut logs from which such segments 26 feet long may be cut are almost impossible to get now.

Another factor in the disappearance of walnut lumber is that mahogany is much softer and easier to cut. The Sheffield mill can cut 35,000 feet of mahogany a day, but it will cut only 20,000 feet of walnut. A mahogany log will cut nearly three times as much lumber as a walnut log of the same size, and therefore it is more economical to cut mahogany.

Although mahogany is taking the place of walnut over all the world, it is not nearly so good as walnut. There is no wood so good as walnut for fine furniture and cabinet work. The reason is that it is hard, it will never warp and it takes a beautiful polish, it has a more varied and beautiful grain and the older it grows the richer it looks.

Instead of being sawed into boards and posts the walnut will hereafter be cut into veneers not much thicker than a piece of blotting paper, and it is only the gnarled trunks that will do for this.

In hundreds of homes in Missouri walnut wood is still used for firewood. But when a man burns walnut lumber he is truly burning money, for while the market price of the logs is less now than it was ten years ago and the demand is less, there is a time coming when the lumber will be worth 20 times what it is now. When the walnut trees that are now a foot in diameter grow to several feet through they will be worth more than any timber that grows in North America. There will always be a good demand for timber of that size and the larger the tree the more value it will have.

"DRY" PITCHERS BEST.

Baseball will be more attractive to many lovers of the national game when there are no more "spitball" pitchers, says Cleveland Plain Dealer. They make the sport slower than it would be otherwise, and their unclean and repulsive way of pitching causes errors which would not be made if the ball were not so slippery when it gets to the fielders. Besides, the mere name of the "spitball" is obnoxious to not a few men and women who are steady patrons of the most popular game in America. Fortunately there is reason to believe that the "spitters" are losing ground. They are not so much in evidence as they were last year or the year before, and they do not count among the leading winners of the big leagues. Krause and Joss, Mullin and Coombs and Bender, Willet and Young, Summers, Circotte, Chece and Johnson, Powell and Waddell, in the American league, use the "spitball" little, or not at all. In the National league, the most famous pitchers, such as Mathewson, Brown, Wiltse, Willis, Camnitz, Moren, Reulbach and Overall, do not rely on the "spitter" for their victories. There is no room for doubt that the best dozen "dry" pitchers in the two big leagues are far superior to the most skillful 12 among those who use the "spitball."

The notion which some persons may have entertained, that the American "jack tar" is an improvident, happy-go-lucky sort of chap, with whom money is "easy come easy go," will have to be modified. An official statement from Washington furnishes proof that many of the enlisted men of the navy are sober, saving, and with an eye to the future. Not less than 27 per cent. have a part of their pay deposited where it is accumulating interest. Many of the sailors devote much of their pay to the support of relatives. Recently a sailor came to his paymaster to exchange a navy check for $1,200 for money with which he proposed to invest in land in the west. The American sailor of the present day is a sturdy, sober, self-respecting chap, and often he has money in the bank with which to back up his good character.

Queer stories come from Morocco, and none has been queerer than that relating to Sultan Mulai Hafid and his treatment of El Roghi, the pretender to the throne. It has been alleged that the sultan kept El Roghi prisoner in a narrow cage in which he was exposed to the multitude and subjected to gross insults and indignities. This proceeding evoked a protest from the European powers, and the sultan "let up" on the prisoner. Now comes the tale that the man in the cage was not El Roghi at all, but an impostor who impersonated the pretender, while the latter was in collusion with the sultan, to whom he paid liberal sums of money, and thus secured immunity from trouble.

Dislike of the cigarette has often been manifested by fathers, mothers and guardians, and sometimes figures in the disposition of legacies. Thus a young man named Acker, of Atlantic Highlands, N. J., has been left $25,000 by his grandfather on condition that for the next 24 years Acker shall refrain from indulging in cigarettes or participating in dissipation. To get the regular allowance under the will Acker must at stated periods make affidavit that he has complied strictly with the terms. That ought to be a pretty fair test of a young man's preference. The sum of $25,000 should be an acceptable offset to deprivation of cigarette smoking.

In Russia the large landed proprietors are now using farm machinery, and demonstrating that when modern methods of agriculture are generally adopted in the czar's domain there will be a large increase in the world's food supply. The farmers who use machinery raise 2,088 pounds of rye and 2,196 pounds of winter wheat per dessiatine (2.7) acres in 1908, against 1,692 and 1,836 pounds respectively raised by the peasants who adhere to their old and crude methods. There ought to be a good field for the sale of farm implements in Russia with showings of this kind to strengthen the arguments of agents.

LURTON LEADS FOR JUSTICE

MOST PROBABLE SUCCESSOR TO LATE RUFUS W. PECKHAM.

Is an Old Associate and Intimate Friend of President Taft.

Washington.—The vacancy on the bench of the supreme court of the United States, caused by the death of Associate Judge Rufus W. Peckham of New York, is the subject of most of the gossip in Washington just now.

It is popularly speaking, the most important matter which will confront President Taft upon his return to the national capital. Well-informed prophets here name Horace H. Lurton of Nashville, judge of the United States circuit court in the Sixth circuit, as most probably Justice Peckham's successor, with Solicitor General Lloyd W. Bowers of the department of justice as the probability for the next vacancy in the court. Mr. Bowers is thought by many to stand a very good chance of getting this one.

Judge Lurton sat on the same judicial bench with Mr. Taft, and was the latter's choice for the vacancy that was later filled by the appointment of William H. Moody of Massachusetts. Mr. Taft was secretary of war when he made the recommendation of Mr. Lurton to President Roosevelt, and was, it is said, very much disappointed when his old associate and intimate friend was not appointed. Mr. Lurton is now about 62 years old and would have ten years to serve before retirement.

FIVE DEAD IN INDIAN FEUD

Brave's Demand for Girl Slave Starts War in Which Family Is Exterminated.

San Francisco.—The story of a remarkable feud between Indians and half-breeds in the mountains of Humboldt county was revealed in the arrest of James Donnelly, a half-breed Klamath Indian, for murder.

The feud started ten years ago, after the accidental drowning of the little son of Jimmie James, an Indian. The boy had been playing with two Indian girls, see-sawing on a limb of a tree overhanging a creek, but slipped into the water. The father of the boy demanded that one of the girls should be given to him as a slave to recompense him for the death of the boy, but the demand was refused and the feud started.

A few days afterward Jimmie James was found dead near Mad river, shot through the back. Then the James faction killed a crippled Indian.

A few days later Harper Bill, one of the other faction, was found dead with several bullets in his body. This was followed by the murder of Harcannep, alias Chickasa, for which Donnelly is held under indictment.

Chickasa was the last member of the James family. His death ended the feud.

Cook County Sheriff Fined.

Springfield, Ill. — Sheriff Christopher Strassheim of Cook county was fined $500 and costs by the Illinois supreme court, which held him in contempt for failing to obey promptly the mandate of the court that Abner Smith, convicted of wrecking the Bank of America of Chicago be sent to the penitentiary at Joliet.

Ex-Senator Dietrich Weds.

Philadelphia.—The marriage of Miss Margaretta Shaw Stewart to Charles H. Dietrich, formerly United States senator from Nebraska, took place Wednesday at the home of the bride's mother, Mrs. William Shaw Stewart.

New York.—William Dahlen, at one time the greatest shortstop in the country, has been appointed manager of the Brooklyn National League Baseball club for 1910.

WOMAN KILLS HER HUSBAND

She Begs to Be Hurried to Jail Fearing Violence from Hands of Man's Relatives.

Pana, Ill.—Frank Stanley was shot and instantly killed by his wife after the two had struggled desperately for the possession of the shotgun with which the woman slew her husband.

Mrs. Stanley was the first to tell of the shooting, when she gave herself up to officers. She begged to be rushed to jail at once, as she feared violence at the hands of her husband's relatives. She pleads self-defense as the cause of the shooting and declares that Stanley had been drinking and handled her roughly in a quarrel over domestic matters.

Under bedclothes, where its cradle had been overturned in the fight for the shotgun, was found the child of the Stanley couple. The baby, less than a year old, was sleeping peacefully within a few feet of its dead father.

In view of her story and the knowledge of friends of the domestic troubles of the Stanleys, it is probable that Mrs. Stanley will be released on bonds.

WOMAN FLIES WITH WRIGHT

Wife of Army Officer Carried Sixty Feet Into Air by Government Aeroplane.

College Park, Md. — With her skirts tied tightly about her ankles, to keep them from fluttering in the breeze, Mrs. Van Deman, wife of Capt. Ralph C. Van Deman, Twenty-first infantry, United States army, occupied the passenger's seat beside Wilbur Wright when he ascended in the government aeroplane here. For four minutes she experienced the sensation of soaring in the air, sometimes as high as 60 feet above the ground. This was the first time a woman had made an ascension in a heavier-than-air machine in the United States.

"Oh!" exclaimed Mrs. Van Deman, when she returned to the ground. "Now I know what makes the birds sing."

DOES NOT REDUCE DEFICIT

New Tariff Law Fails to Meet Predictions of Its Authors, According to Treasury Statement.

Washington.—The new tariff law is not reducing the treasury deficit, as predicted by its authors. It is shown by a statement that the deficit for the fiscal year up to October 23 was more than $32,000,000.

For the same period last year the deficit was only $7,000,000 greater, or $39,997,000. The new tariff has produced $23,376,000 more than the Dingley law in the same months last year, and had the government kept within its expenditures of the former year the result would have been a deficit of only $16,000,000. But the report shows that the expenses were increased more than $16,000,000 above that of the same period last year, most of it in the war and navy departments.

GREEK NAVY REBELS

TIBALDOS FACTION SEIZES ARSENAL AND DEFIES THE GOVERNMENT.

KING GEORGE MAY ABDICATE

Outbreak Brings the Military Troubles to a Crisis and Threatens Occupant of Throne—Makes Threat of Dictatorship.

Athens.—The whole military crisis in Greece was brought to a head by the actual revolt of the Tibaldos faction in the Greek navy.

The situation is acute and whether or not the next event will be the long-expected abdication of King George seems to hinge on the happenings of the immediate future. The government is meeting the situation with unexpected firmness.

Tibaldos seized the government arsenal at Salamis Friday and is now entrenched there with a force of about 300 naval officers, the men, who withdrew from the city on Wednesday, leaving a 24-hour ultimatum for the government's consideration.

The struggle over the arsenal was perfunctory, the guard putting up but a feeble defense. It is recognized everywhere, however, as an overt act against the throne, and it was immediately met at the palace by a proclamation of Tibaldos as a traitor and an order for his arrest.

Troops have been thrown around the ministry of marine, and business is practically suspended in the capital.

The question of the hour is "What will the fleet do?" The warships are anchored off Keratsini, on the farther side of the island of Salamis, and the premier is waiting anxiously to see whether its officers and men will declare for Tibaldos or against him.

Tibaldos is the commander of a flotilla of torpedo boats and submarines. It appears that he demands that he he appointed minister of marine, and threatens that, if this is not conceded, he will overthrow the government and establish a dictatorship.

If Tibaldos succeeds in winning over the fleet, as it is rumored he will, it is feared that he will be in a position to carry out his threats.

PACIFIC SLOPE IS SHAKEN

California and Oregon Experience Severe Earth Shocks—Financial Damage Not Great.

San Francisco.—The earthquake shock felt in northern California and southern Oregon Thursday is reported from a number of places to be more severe than any felt in several years previously. The vibrations continued from 10 to 15 seconds, according to observers in different towns.

Windows were shattered, chimneys prostrated, dishes broken and small pieces of furniture moved, but so far as known the financial damage was nominal.

Humboldt county seems to have been the center of the seismic disturbance, but telegraph and telephone communication is interrupted and only meager reports have been received. It does not appear, however, that the shock was of great violence.

Among the cities and towns where the quake was felt are Redding, Red Bluff, Chico, McCloud, Weaverville, Dunsmuir and Crescent City, in California, and Grant's Pass and Marshfield, Oregon. It was not felt in San Francisco, nor was it recorded at the local weather bureau.

AGREE ON FIGHT TERMS

Jeffries and Johnson Sign Agreement for Heavyweight Championship of the World.

New York.—James J. Jeffries, retired champion of the world, and Jack Johnson, the big negro who now holds the title, met in the banquet hall of the Hotel Albany and arranged terms for a battle of 45 rounds before the club which offers the best terms. There is to be a side bet of $5,000. The winner is to take 75 per cent. of the purse.

The fight is to take place not later than July 5, 1910, and each man is to post not less than $10,000, one-half of which is to go as a side bet.

Forty Miners Entombed.

Cardiff, Wales.—Eleven bodies have been recovered from the mine near Bargood, in which 40 men were imprisoned Friday by an explosion. In an attempt to rescue the men the manager of the colliery and two others were caught by a landslide. It is feared they are dead.

Thirty-Five Hurt in Wreck.

Fort Wayne, Ind.—In a collision between a Chicago bound immigrant train and an east-bound freight at Tocsin, on the Erie railroad Friday, 35 immigrants—men, women and children—were injured, some of them perhaps fatally.

Airship to Cross Atlantic.

GEBHARDT AT NEW YORK CONFESSES TO THREE MURDERS.

Wife Says He Had Seven Former Wives All of Whom Are Dead.

New York — Traces of what may prove to have been another murder committed by Frederick Gebhardt were found by the police. In the jail at Islip, where he is held as the slayer of Anna Luther, Gebhardt admitted to Coroner Savage of Suffolk county that he had been guilty of three such crimes, all against women, for the purpose of securing their money. He said he would make a full statement.

Mrs. Gebhardt, when shown the Sing Sing record of her husband, broke down completely for the first time and repeated the statement made the night of her husband's arrest and afterwards denied, that she knew Gebhardt had seven former wives, all of whom were in their graves. She said that if the truth were known he would be found to be another Johann Hoch, the Chicago wife-murderer.

"WENT THAW ONE BETTER"

Woman Seeking Divorce Charges Husband with Inhuman Treatment—Burns Her with Lighted Cigar.

Philadelphia.—Extraordinary assertions of inhuman treatment at the hands of her husband, Frederic Collins, Jr., a widely-known club man, who lives at Mount Airy, are made by Mrs. Madeline Collins in her suit for divorce.

According to Mrs. Collins, her husband is an admirer of Harry K. Thaw, and she says he "went Thaw one better" in his treatment of her. Not only does she charge him with beating her, but she declares he burned her with cigars in fits of anger; one time, after pouring ice water over her, he forced her head under a spigot and turned on the scalding hot water.

As a result of this treatment, Mrs. Collins declares, her health has been ruined and she is now suffering from tuberculosis. She left Mr. Collins last summer and is now living with friends. Collins is still at his home with his children by former wives. He had two, according to Mrs. Collins.

CUBAN OFFICIALS FIGHT DUEL

Cabinet Ministers After Resigning Meet on Field of Honor—Neither Was Injured.

Havana.—The dispute between Secretary of State Justo Garcia Velez and Secretary of Sanitation Mathias Duque, whose resignations from the cabinet have been accepted by President Gomez, culminated in a duel with pistols.

The men exchanged four shots, but neither was injured.

Paris.—Henri Bernstein, the dramatist, and Francis Chevassu, a dramatic critic, fought a duel with pistols at Prince park. Neither was injured. M. Chevassu fired and missed, while Bernstein did not discharge his weapon.

The duel grew out of the publication of an article written by Bernstein in which he attacked the critic.

LINER SUFFERS IN STORM

Kronzprinzessin Cecilie Life Belts Reported Picked Up—Sea Sweeps French Town.

Paris. — An unconfirmed report from Cherbourg states that life belts from the steamer Kronprinzessin Cecilie, from Bremen October 26, and Cherbourg and Southampton October 27, have been found on the coast of Normandy.

There has been a severe storm on the northern seaboard of France and much damage has been done. The little port of Grandicamp has suffered severely and 25 fishing vessels belonging to the port have been lost.

The sea swept over part of the town, destroying a number of houses, drowning cattle and sweeping away property.

RIOTS BREAK OUT IN SEOUL

Mob Fires Railway Station—Garrison Ordered Out to Quell Disturbance.

Seoul, Korea.—The Union station here of the Seoul-Fusan railroad was attacked by 300 rioters at midnight Friday and partially burned. The rioters were dispersed, but gathered again and were said to be moving northward.

No casualties have been reported.

The garrison has been ordered out to quell the disturbance.

Woman Prevents Robbery.

New York. — When she saw her husband about to be held up and robbed in his store, Mrs. Isaac Lipschitz grabbed a handful of pepper and threw it into the eyes of the three men, one of whom held a revolver and was threatening to shoot. They fled.

Five-Cent Store Burns.

Cleveland, O.—The S. S. Kresge & Co. five and ten-cent notion store, in Ontario street, was destroyed by fire Friday. Several young women had a narrow escape. Five were carried out of the building in the arms of firemen.

Posse Seeks Wife Slayer.

Braintree, Mass.—A posse of citizens is hunting Joseph Miller, who shot and killed his 19-year-old wife in Braintree Friday and then escaped in the woods.

FINE RECIPE FOR COLDS.

Any druggist can supply these ingredients or will get them from his wholesale house.

"Mix half pint of good whiskey, two ounces of glycerine; half ounce of Concentrated pine compound. Shake the bottle well each time and use in doses of a teaspoonful to a tablespoonful four times a day." This prescription is said to work wonders.

The Concentrated pine is a special pine product and comes only in half ounce bottles, each enclosed in an airtight case, but be sure it is labeled "Concentrated."

The Best Food for Workers.

The best food for those who work with hand or brain is never high priced.

The best example of this is found in Quaker Oats. It stands at the top among foods that supply nourishment and vigor, without taxing the digestion, and yet it is the least expensive food one can eat.

This great food value and low cost make it an ideal food for families who want to get the greatest good from what they eat.

Laborers, factory or farm hands, fed plentifully on Quaker Oats will work better and with less fatigue than if fed on almost any other kind of food. All of these facts were proved and very interesting information about human foods were gathered by Professor Fisher of Yale University in 1908. In addition to the regular package Quaker Oats is packed in large sized family packages either with or without china dishes. 8

Labor Unions Fight Tuberculosis.

Ten fraternal and benefit organizations, with a membership of nearly 4,000,000, and three international labor unions with a membership of over 100,000 have joined the ranks of the fighters against consumption within the last year, according to a statement of the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis. The fraternal orders and unions now in the fight against tuberculosis are the Modern Woodmen of America, Brotherhood of American Yeomen, Order of Eagles, Improved Order of Red Men, Knights of Pythias, Royal Arcanum, Workmen's Circle, Knights of Columbus, Royal League, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and Foresters of America, the International Photo-Engravers' Union of North America, the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' union, the International Boot and Shoe Workers' union, and the International Typographical union.

How to Care for the Child.

Perplexed mother writes: "My child has sneezing fits after the morning sponge bath. What would you advise?" Some mothers give their babies a hypodermic of morphine for sneezing. But we have always felt that this was too harsh a remedy. Give the baby about three tablespoonfuls of Old Tom gin with a little sugar and a pinch of lemon peel. The sugar makes this remedy more grateful to the child. Be sure to keep this prophylactic away from father.

THE DIFFERENCE

Coffee Usually Means Sickness, But Postum Always Means Health.

Those who have never tried the experiment of leaving off coffee and drinking Postum in its place and in this way regaining health and happiness can learn much from the experience of others who have made the trial.

One who knows says: "I drank coffee for breakfast every morning until I had terrible attacks of indigestion producing days of discomfort and nights of sleeplessness. I tried to give up the use of coffee entirely, but found it hard to go from hot coffee to a glass of water. Then I tried Postum.

"It was good and the effect was so pleasant that I soon learned to love it and have used it for several years. I improved immediately after I left off coffee and took on Postum and am now entirely cured of my indigestion and other troubles all of which were due to coffee. I am now well and contented and all because I changed from coffee to Postum.

"Postum is much easier to make right every time than coffee, for it is so even and always reliable. We never use coffee now in our family. We use Postum, and are always well."

"There's a reason" and it is proved by trial.

DEEP WATERWAY IS DEMANDED BY ALL

Great River Convention Is Held in New Orleans.

PRESIDENT FAVORS PROJECT

Promises the Present Administration Will Support Issuance of Federal Bonds if Fourteen-Foot Program Proves Feasible.

New Orleans, Nov. 1.—Ringing demands for "14 feet through the valley" and elaborate argument in support of the program for the creation of a deep waterway from the lakes to the gulf have marked the great convention of the Deep Waterway association that opened here Saturday.

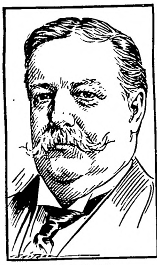
President Taft, Vice-President Sherman, Speaker Cannon, governors of th Mississippi valley states, innumerable senators and representatives and a mighty throng of private citizens who believe in the big river project are here and all urge that it be undertaken and carried to a speedy conclusion.

President Taft Promises Support.

President Taft, who arrived in New Orleans escorted by a great flotilla, after an illuminating trip down the Mississippi river from St. Louis, landed from the lighthouse tender Oleander about eight o'clock Saturday morning, and was driven to his hotel through streets that were canopied with magnolia branches, palmettoes and southern moss, and everywhere entwined in the decorations were the mottoes "Fourteen Feet Through the Valley" and "River Rate Regulation Is Rate Regulation." At the Athenaeum in the afternoon the president aroused a storm of cheers by promising that if the 14-feet project proved feasible and advisable, the present administration would favor the issuance of government bonds to defray the cost.

Not for a "Pork Barrel."

At the same time Mr. Taft made it plain that he would not stand for any plan to make a "pork barrel" of the project. He said he opposed any such general bond issue of $500,000,000 or $1,000,000,000 for waterways improvement, the money to be cut up and parceled out to different sections. He declared that the improvement of waterways had been carried forward in a haphazard fashion in the past, and that a new method should be adopted.



President Taft.

"I believe in the deep waterway," said the president. "I am for it, and I shall use all the power that I possess in doing what may be accomplished to give you citizens of this great valley what you so earnestly desire. It is all a part of a still greater movement inaugurated by Theodore Roosevelt, and properly called by him the conservation of our national resources.

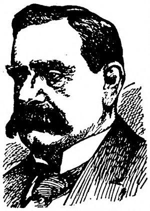
"The projects for irrigation and for the improvement of waterways in the future are not to be for the purpose of distributing 'pork' to every part of the country. Every measure is to be adopted on the ground that it will be useful to the whole country. They are not to be adopted for sending certain congressmen back to Washington or for making certain parts of the country profitable during the expenditure of the money.

"We should take up every comprehensive project on its merits and determine whether the country where the project is to be carried out has so far deevloped as to justify the enormous expenditure of money and if it will be useful when done. When we decide in favor of a project, I believe in issuing bonds to carry it to completion as rapidly as possible. It has been proposed that we issue bonds for $500,000,000 or $1,000,000,000, and cut it up and parcel the money out in this and that section of the country. I am opposed to any such proposition, because it not only smells of the 'pork barrel,' but would be a 'pork barrel.'"

Sherman, Too, Is for It.

Vice-President James S. Sherman has brought to the people of the middle west the message of the east, promising enthusiastic support of the waterway program. "We people of the east depend on your people of the west," said he. "When we help you, we help ourselves, so there is every reason why we should do all in our power for you, as soon as we realize what you want and why you want it."

Speaker Cannon and Secretary of War Dickinson are no less outspoken in their assurances of support, and many senators and representatives, among them Senator Lorimer of Illinois, the father of the deep waterway movement, this afternoon made addresses full of hopeful enthusiasm.



Secretary of War Dickinson.

Kavanaugh Opens Convention.

William K. Kavanaugh of Missouri, president of the association, called the convention to order Saturday morning and set forth briefly the aims and plans of the organization. He said the deep waterway work is now in this condition:

1. The sanitary district of Chicago has built the deep waterway, practically to Joliet, nearly 40 miles, and $60,000,000 have been spent thus far on the work.

2. The entire route of the lakes-to-the-gulf deep waterway from Joliet to New Orleans, through the Des Plaines river, the Illinois river and the Mississippi river, has been surveyed under direction of congress by United States engineers, who have officially reported to congress that the building of the deep waterway is feasible.

3. The people of the state of Illinois have adopted a constitutional amendment providing for a bond issue of $20,000,000, the money to be spent in constructing the deep waterway southward from Joliet.

4. A bill introduced by United States Representative Richard Bartholdt of Missouri is now pending in congress, providing for the issuance by the United States government of bonds to the amount of $500,000,000, the money to be spent in constructing this deep waterway from the lakes to the gulf and other meritorious projected river improvements.

5. It is intended to ask the Sixty-first congress to pass a bill providing definitely that the United States government undertake the construction of the deep waterway from the point where the Illinois work will end, to the Gulf of Mexico.

In the afternoon, following the address of President Taft, Clifford Pinchot, head of the government forestry department, made an address on the conservation of the nation's natural resources.

In the evening the delegates to the convention were entertained at a stag smoker by the Progressive union of New Orleans. This evening all the delegates and the ladies accompanying them were the guests of the Progressive union at the New Orleans Opera house, where "La Juive" was given by the French Opera Company.

His Politics at Home.

A political canvasser called at a home the other day and inquired as to the political affiliations of the man of the house.

"Oh, well," said the housewife, "he's everything. He's nice when he's away, and he's not so nice at other times.'

"But about politics," said the canvasser. "Is he a Democrat or a Republican?"

"Well, it depends on who he is with," said the lady. "If it's policy to be a Democrat when he's with Democrats, he's a Democrat, and when he's with Republicans he's a Republican."

"I understand," persisted the canvasser, "but between ourselves, what is he at home?"

"Oh, at home he's a perfect terror."

HAS A VERY BAD FIRE

DAMAGE WILL REACH OVER THREE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS.

GROUP OF LODGE HOMES LOST

Big Columbian Block in Ruins and Ransford Hotel Heavily Damaged. Starts Early in the Morning.

Brainerd.—The most destructive fire known in Brainerd for many years is still raging, although under control. The total loss is estimated at fully $300,000.

The flames broke out in the basement of the Columbian block on Sixth street about 5:30 a. m. At 9 the building, a three-story brick, and all its contents the whole valued at $100,000 or more, was in ruins. Clark's hardware store and Schwartz's drugstore occupied the main rooms on the ground floor. On the second were offices of business and professional men, and on the third floor were the quarters of various fraternities.

The Odd Fellows' building, adjoining the Columbian block, was then gutted by the flames. The postoffice was next to follow. All the letter mail was saved and a large part of the fixtures were taken out, although in a badly damaged condition.

At 9:30 the fire attacked the Ransford hotel, which is three stories in height and occupies half a block. The firemen made their fiercest fight at this time, realizing that if the big building could not be saved, many others adjacent to it would have to go also.

The hotel was thoroughly drenched on every floor with water and the loss of furniture and fixtures, chiefly caused by the water, is estimated at over $100,000.

The Jameson building in which was the saloon of Warren & Co., and Lauer's restaurant and saloon, and Dilling's restaurant, were burned.

The Columbian block was occupied by the Black Haw club and was also used as residence and flats. The Masonic and Red Men lodges lost all their paraphernalia as did the Grand Army and Modern Brotherhood, Hibernians and Machinist lodges. Several dwelling houses on the north side caught fire from sparks, but were saved.

The insurance will run from one-half to two-thirds of the individual losses.

TEACHERS IN CONVENTION.

Minnesota Educational Association Begins Meeting in Minneapolis.

Minneapolis.—The most largely attended convention ever held by the Minnesota Educational association, the forty-seventh, opened in the Auditorium with a general session that was called to order by C. G. Shultz, state superintendent of public instruction. President W. F. Webster then took the chair and delivered his annual address. He was followed by Superintendent R. E. Denfield, of Duluth, who spoke on "The New Purpose in Education."

The high school council met with P. C. Tonning, of Willmar, in the chair. The speakers were Mr. Denfeld, M. P. Forbes, of Marshall; G. A. Franklin, of Austin; F. E. Lurton, of Anoka; J. M. McConnell, of Mankato Normal; L. J. Montgomery, of Faribault; L. J. Weld, of Moorhead Normal, and E. L. Porter, of Hastings. Tonight Thomas P. Gore, the blind senatro from Oklahoma, will deliver his lecture on "Abe Lincoln and Jeff Davis."

An interesting feature of the convention was the banquets and round table discussions of the various sections at restaurants Friday evening. The convention closed Saturday morning.

RECORD RATE ON GRAIN.

Three-and-One-Half Cents For Carriage of Wheat Offered.

Duluth.—A record price for the carriage of wheat—3½ cents—was offered at Fort William with no takers.

The situation at Fort William is altogether unusual and is causing local grain shippers much anxiety. Wheat in unlimited quantities from the Saskatchewan district is pouring into this port and the elevator tonnage is nearly exhausted. At the highest mark of the season not a single boat could be chartered for grain. Vessel owners will not accept the high offer which is equivalent to $1.20 for ore shipment or 65 per cent more than the boats are getting for carrying ore.

The best rate of the season at the local port is 3 cents on two storage cargoes of flax from Duluth to Buffalo. Tonnage for more than a million bushels was chartered at a rate which is equal to nearly $1.20 for ore.

MURDER AT CANON LAKE.

Two Fishermen Killed in Their Hut by Tramps.

Faribault.—Thomas Murray, an inoffensive old fisherman living in a hut near the shore of Canon lake, four miles west of Faribault, was shot to death.

At the same time Joseph LaRosse, his partner, was attacked and repeatedly cut with a knife. LaRosse is still living, but is so weak from the loss of blood and the shock that he is unable to tell who committed the bloody deed.

INDIANS FIND RED EYE.

Oginum Reds Celebrate Prohibition With Big Jag.

Cass Lake.—The Indians turned a trick on the government despite the campaign to prohibit the sale of liquor to them.

After drawing their pay at Onigum and failing in every attempt to secure liquor at Walker, seventy-two of the "redskins" boarded a train for Park Rapids. Every one of the band returned dead drunk.

Indian Agent Frater and County Commissioner Burns witnessed the men and their squaws as they staggered off the train. When the expressman was unloading a trunk an Indian yelled at him to be careful for it contained; he said, real booze. Upon an investigation it was found to hold fifty-two bottles of whisky.

The officials were dumfounded at the nature of the disclosures and will move for an early investigation of the situation at Park Rapids and other towns.

Cass Lake has set out to obey the orders of the authorities. Tuesday was the day fixed for the closing of the saloons, and all of them, except the two which have a special license and permit from the government men, promptly removed their intoxicating liquors. Two of the places will be continued as pool halls. Two have been closed. Not a drop of intoxicants is being sold at any of the five places ordered closed. There was no sign of any trouble or excitement.

The only federal officer here was Deputy Marshal Larson, who came from Bemidji to watch proceedings.

ONE LICENSE REVOKED.

Liquor Dealer at Bemidji Shown to Have Sold to Indians.

Bemidji.—Without a single dissenting voice, the city council voted to revoke the license granted T. Dugas, the revocation being made at the request of H. A. Larson, special agent of the Indian department, who charged Dugas and F. Gagnon, from whom Dugas leased his building, with selling liquor to Indians.

The special agent produced affidavits from three special agents who stated positively that Mr. Dugas and Mr. Gagnon had sold intoxicatting liquor to Red Lake Indians.

TAWNEY VISITS THE CANAL.

With Congressional Committee On Appropriation.

Winona. — Congressman James A. Tawney has left for Washington, where he will spend a few days before sailing next Tuesday with the other members of the appropriations committee of the lower house to the Panama canal zone to secure information concerning the appropriations to be made by congress for the carrying on of canal work.

The congressman is in receipt of the estimates submitted by the secretary of war through the treasury department for canal appropriations for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1910. The estimated appropriations for the next fiscal year for canal expenditures aggregate $48,063,524. This amount is $15,000,000 in excess of the appropriations for the current fiscal year, and is the largest estimate submitted for any fiscal year since the work of canal construction was begun.

The principal item making up this increase is the estimate for the purchase and delivery of material, supplies and equipment and such other expenses not in the United States as the commission deems necessary to promote the construction of the Isthmain canal, for the departments of construction, engineering, quartermasters' subsistence, disbursements and examination of accounts.

HURT AS ENGINE HITS AUTO.

Four Men Hurled From Machine Near Bemidji; Three Are Injured.

Bemidji.—While Mayor J. G. Pogue of Bemidji, G. Meyer, of St. Paul, T. R. Symons of Bemidji, local manager for Minneapolis Brewing company, and a gentleman whose name cannot be learned, were crossing the railroad track at Wilton, the automobile in which the party was riding was struck by an engine of a freight train and the entire party hurled into the air.

The auto was demolished and Pogue and Symons were lodged on the pilot of the engine, otherwise they would have been thrown under the wheels and ground to pieces.

MINNESOTA BUTTER FIRST.

Milwaukee. — Minnesota carried off the banner for the highest score in the contest conducted by the National Buttermakers' Association at the dairy show. Wisconsin was a close second. Minnesota won the first and second prizes in the whole milk sweepstakes, but Wisconsin won the first and second prizes in gathered cream sweepstakes. The banner was awarded to Minnesota, because it had ten highest scores.

BLOOD POISON FROM PIMPLE.

Wife of Locomotive Engineer Dead at East Grand Forks.

East Grand Forks. — Mrs. Joseph La France, wife of a Northern Pacific engineer, died from blood poisoning, resulting from a mere scratch of a pimple on her face several weeks ago. About ten days ago the spot became inflamed and blood poison showed its effects, soon spreading over her entire face and assuming virulent character.

AS UNDERSTOOD IN BOSTON

The Traditional Episode of "Little Miss Muffet" Brought Into Every-Day Cognizance.

A diminutive specimen of juvenile femininity yclept Miss Muffet had placed herself in a sitting posture upon an article of household furniture ordinarily termed an ottoman or hassock—

Ministering to the gratification of her gustatory organs by ingurgitating the coagulated portion of bovine lacteal fluid mingled with the watery serum of the same which remains after the coagulated portion has been segregated and withdrawn.

Happening to glance downward she observed that a specimen of the genus Aranea, class Arachnida, remarkable for its ability to produce filaments of extraordinary tenuity from its own interior, had taken a position upon the ottoman or hassock in immediate proximity.

Which totally unexpected incident aroused her apprehension to such an extent that she immediately, not to say precipitately, arose from her sitting posture and departed from the locality, leaving the intruder in undisputed possession of the apartment.

THE SUNBEAM.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under th Act of Congress of March 3, 1879

There is one good feature of draining the land by county ditches, and that is that it makes the man that took this land for speculation, pay for improveing his own land.

The farmers who stayed and made their homes on the eleven towns are beginning to reap their reward, and those that took land for speculation will get theirs, in taxes, as soon as all the county ditches are put in.

The order withdrawing this eleven township land from any more homestead entries will not have much affect with only a small part of the eastern part of them, as all the land that is of any value has been taken. All that is left in this part of them is a few isolated tracts of 4th, rate swamp, and whoever buys it can pay out it's weight in gold in taxes for state ditches. Better let the goverment keep it, they are a rich corporation.

The engineer board of the war department at Washington has reported adversely on the proposition for a survey of the Red Lake River east of Thief River Falls, with a view to improveing it for commerce. This ends the matter for the present, but Mr. Steenerson says that if the board of engineers refused to order the survey, he would ask congress at its next session to make the legislation mandatory instead of discrotionary as is the present law, or in other words he will compell them to make this survey by a law passed by congress.

Great long platforms of promises is not what we want of proposed members of the next legislature. We are not the whole state of Minnesota, but only the 61st, district, and when you see any candidate fixing himself up a good long platform telling you what he is going to do if you elect him to the legislature, just mark that man down as a hippocrit, that is fixing himself up a platform to get in on, and not to stand on. Just see what long and fine platforms Hanson and Opsahl had fixed "to go in on," but they forgot all about them after they was elected and went rooting around St. Paul hunting for "pork barrels," and when they found them they was empty.

Notice Of War.

The Red Lake Falls Gazette informs us that Theo. Garceau will not be a candidat for mayor of Red Lake Falls and that John Duffy will have the field all to himself Mr. Duffy has been mayor of Red Lake Falls for several years, but has never had any opposition in Red Lake Falls allright, but if he enters the field as a candidate for the legislature next year, he will find that he will have opposition.—Thief River Falls News.

It would seem from the above that if Mr. Duffy should become a candidate that Eeastman may treat him to "hot roast." We have never heard whether Mr. Duffy seeks this honor, or not, but if he does it would give us great pleasure toward the close of hot campaign between him and Eastman, to write up and publish a sersational article to the affet that, "Duffy's Spanish war experience just fitted him up to be a member of the legislature."

LANDS WITHDRAWN.

No More Homesteads, In The 11 Townships,

Department Of The Interior
U S Land Office Crookston,
Minnesota, October 30th, 1909.

This office is in receipt of a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under date of October 13, 1909, as follows:

"The act of February 20,1904, (33 Stat. 46), which provided for the disposal of the land in 11 townships in the western part of the Red Lake Indian reservation contained the following provision;

"The land above described which shall remain unsold at the expiration of five years from date of the first sale hereunder, shall be offered for sale at not less than $4,00 per acre (and lands remaining unsold after such sale shall be subject to private entry and sale at said price). without any conditions whatever, except the payment of the purchase price."

The sale referred to closed October the 8th, 1904.

You will therefore discontinue the allowance of homestead entries for said lands from the date of receipt of this letter and will at as early date as practicable transmit a list of the lands remaining unsold in said 11 townships." Respectipully (Signed)

Fred Dennett,
Commissioner.

In accordance with the instructions contained in the above letter all the lands unentered in the said eleven Red Lake townships have been withdrawn from entry, and no entries of any kind can be made thereon until further instructions have been received from the Department.

Respectifully,
R. J. Montague, Register.

Exercise and Eating.

Nothing Was the Matter.

"A newsboy I knew," said a yachtsman, "took to the sea. He became cabin boy on a tramp collier. He was a good boy, but—

"Once, when our white squadron was at Newport, this collier steamed in her slow way shoreward with her ensign upside down, the signal of distress—distress of the direst. Instantly a pretty sight was to be seen. Every warship in the fleet lowered a lifeboat, and all of those beautiful, snowy boats, manned by jackies in spotless white duck, raced for the grimy old collier at breakneck speed—a pretty sight indeed. The captain of the collier stood on the bridge. He waved his hat, and the crews pulled all the faster. As they drew close they heard the man's cries.

"'Come on! Pull! Get down to it!' he roared, dancing about wildly.

"'What's the matter, captain?' the first officer to reach the collier asked breathlessly.

"'Why, nothing's the matter,' the captain answered in a surprised voice.

"'Then why's your ensign upside down?'

"The captain looked aloft, then frowned.

"'It's that boy Hank again,' said he. 'And here I thought it was a regatta.'"

Light and Dark Cigars.

A striking example of the ordinary smoker's ignorance on the subject of smokes is the popular superstition that a dark looking cigar is stronger than a lighter colored one. Some strong cigars have dark wrappers, but the dark wrapper does not by any means indicate a strong cigar. Dark, gummy tobacco, if thoroughly cured, is the mildest form. Of course if dark tobacco is not thoroughly cured it will be strong, but so will light tobacco, for that matter. Any cigar man will bet you that the dark color is usually, though not always, a sign of a ripe, well cured leaf, which is therefore milder nine times out of ten than the lighter hued leaf. But when it is known that every manufacturer makes both dark and light cigars and that he uses exactly the same blend of filler in both and that the wrapper only constitutes a small fractional part of the cigar it is clearly seen that the shade of the wrapper has little to do with the strength of the cigar. Ask the dealer for a strong cigar. He hands out a dark one, and the imagination does the rest.—Harper's Weekly.

How Spiders Undress.

It is an interesting sight indeed to watch a spider change its skin and one that will well repay any one for the time taken up by waiting for the little known—generally speaking—event to take place. When preparing for the change the spider stops eating for several days and makes his preliminary arrangements by fastening himself by a short thread of web to one of the main lines of his snare, this to hold him firmly while he proceeds to undress. First the skin cracks all round the thorax, being held only by the fore part. Next the lower part of the body is uncovered, and then comes the struggle to free the legs. He works and kicks vigorously, seeming to have a very hard time of it. Fifteen minutes of continued perseverance, however, brings him out of his old dress, the struggle causing him to appear limp and lifeless for some time after it is finished.

An Ancient Sky Pilot.

From Garnett's "Anthology," volume 7, page 48, I copy the following, taken from the "Writings of Lucian," a Greek born about 100 A. D.:

"We were suddenly caught by a whirlwind, which turned our vessel several times around in a circle with tremendous velocity and lifted it above 3,000 stadia in the air, not settling it down again on the sea, but kept it suspended above the water at that height and carried us on, with swelled sails, above the clouds."

In these days of air conquest this quotation might be of utmost interest to aeronauts and also literary men This ancient Gulliver long preceded Swift, and as for outdistancing Jules Verne another quotation is added:

"Having thus continued our course through the sky for a space of seven days and as many nights, on the eighth day we described a sort of earth in the air," etc. (which proved to be the moon).

The thoroughly familiar vernacular expression "going some" applies with original vigor to this early and perhaps first sky pilot.—New York Times

Mr. Cousins moved into John Quirks house on the R. Sullivan farm Monday.

The Swanson and Rodman threshing machine is threshing in the Rhoda neighborhood this week.

THE SUNBEAM, seems to have a habit of strikeing out for N. D. on a threshing trip every fail, in large quantites.

There will be a social bali at the Kratka hall on Saturday evening November 20th. Everybody come and have a good time.

Miss Skeie reports 22 scholars enrolled in this district. Laura and Augusta Wold were the only two scholars that attended every day the past month.

John Foloni was a passenger down the river on the Hanson steam boat today, on his way to Red Lake Falis, where he will get his citizin papers next Monday.

All kinds of tame strawberry plants for sale, by John Wjientek, the Hilda Nurseryman. Now is a good time of year to fix up a nice strwberry bed for next season.

Ole O. Roisaland, of Kratka, returned home from N. D. this week. How do we kno w he has got home? Because he ordered the address of THE SUNBEAM, changed from Devils Lake N.D. to Kratka Minnesota.

The Ole Giving threshing machine will about finish up on the north side of the river this week and be ready to cross over into this neighborhood the first of next week, and if the old weather clerk will only keep that old leaky water tank calked up for a week, or so more the farmers will get their threshing done.

C. L. Clark brought out a bronko from Charles Newburys barn, in Thief River, that we do not see how Mr. Newbury could spare him. He had ought to have kept him to jet out to ladies and children, to drive for he is a litlle the swiftest bronk that ever come east. He won't kick, Oh no!

A. D. Brown, frome Neptune passed by here Monday in his gasoline launch "Neptune" going down to Thief River Falis, returning yesterday. Mr. Brown is not botherd with bad roads when he wats to go to town, for he can hitch up Neptune, and go down in short order, at any time.

Ludvig Larson, of Kratka had a fine crop of early dent corn, that he is sure will fully mature in this country every year. This was a very favorable corn year, which we can not depend on geting every year, hence it would be a good plan to raise a variety of corn that would be pretty sure to get out of the way of Mr. Jack Frost any season.

School clerk Swanson started in to run school on his own hook in his district this fall, by hireing a young girl to teach their school at a bargain rate of $32, a month, that did not have any certificate or permission to teach school. They ran the school for a month, (she of course boarding to Swansons), before Super intendant Anderson found them out and closed them out of business, and the young lady left for her home to tell ma about how she taught the young idea how to shoot for a whole month, in school clerk Swansons district. He is a great man that Swanson! He has a great head on "im" with lots of hair on top, and a small amount of brains inside.

News From Kratka.

Fine weather this!

Threshing is geting well along toward the finish and with one more weeks fair weather we will about all know how rich we got this year.

Knut Austain has just compleated a new stock barn.

Everbody is complaining about bad roads, except mail carrier Fred DuChamp, who has got so accostomed to them that he does not expect anything else.

The dance at the Kratka hall Saturday evening was not very well attended, for the reason that most of the boys got all the danceing they wanted around threshing machines during the day. All who attended had a fine time.

Mrs. Mike Connely and Miss A. Kelly were transacting business at the Kratka store on Sunday. Miss Kelly is teaching the scholl in the district south of the river this fall.

Knut Austin was to Crookston last week, on the sad mission of attending the funeral of his brother, A.K. Austin, who died in that city October 28th.

Mr. Anton C. Skog liveing just west of Kratka threshed a fine crop of grain last week. He had 22 ½ bushels of wheat 40 bushels of oats and 38 bushels of barley to the acre.

Our ferry is again in good running order, and we mannaged to get it fixed without haveing to call on Opsahl for empty pork barrels to bale it out with. By the way! What about that Sunbeam bridge, that we Kratka people signed a petition for last winter? Can't Opsahl and Hanson put in a bridge with empty pork barrels?

Singer Bros. have taken a contract to deliver a big lot of flour and feed to Red Lake Agency for the government.

We suppose when the farmers begin to butcher their hogs next month, they will begin to order some of them empty pork barrels from Opsahl and Hanson.

Edward Singer, of Rhoda was assisting his brother Stephen at the Kratka store a couple of days this week.

The farmers are all rushing plowing along during this fine Indian summer weather.

First Use of Iron.

As a result of his interesting investigations, Dr. Ridgeway concludes that the smelting of iron originated in central Europe, and especially in the region known as Noricum, equivalent to modern Austria and Bavaria.

In Egypt it can be traced back to the ninth century B. C., and in Libya to about 450 B. C. First mention of its use in China goes back to 400 B. C., while in Uganda it is said to have been in use only some five or six centuries.

The above date for the first use of iron in Egypt refers to the metal obtained by smelting. The use of native iron in the form of meteorites dates back to remote antiquity. The weapons made from these were obtained, like flint implements, by chipping. And it is interesting to remember that recent investigations have shown that the iron of many meteorites is a sort of natural steel.

Old English Fine.

In the past if one Englishman called another a liar there was something to pay. The seventeenth century mayor, sheriff and city grandees generally were keen on this point of etiquette. The direct accusation cost 11s. 6d. ($2.76); the subtle hint 6s. 8d. ($1.60). And there was a reduction on repetitions.

Swearing, too, was promptly suppressed. In 1650 a law was passed laying down the penalty for a first offense. The fines were graduated. That for a lord was 30 shillings ($7.20), for an esquire 10 shillings ($2.40), while all "inferior persons" could have a "few words" for 3s. 4d. (80 cents).

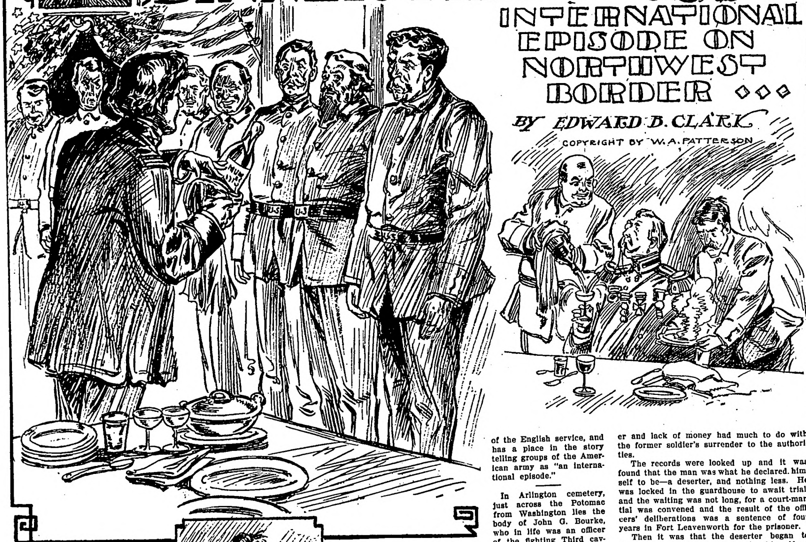
LIEUTENANT FITZGERALD'S DINNER PARTY

INTERNATIONAL EPISODE ON NORTHWEST BORDER

BY EDWARD B. CLARK

COPYRIGHT BY W. A. PATTERSON



ASK ANY gray-haired retired-list American soldier in Washington for an army story and instantly he will start to tell you of the tale of Lieut. Michael FitzGerald's dinner party. It is a favorite army yarn, but not often does it find its way outside of the circle of the blue.

Lieut. Michael FitzGerald became Major Michael FitzGerald in course of time and because of wounds received in the very forefront of a battle for his adopted country he was placed upon the retired list of the army. He died within a few months at his quiet little home town in Pennsylvania.

The dinner of Lieut. FitzGerald was an international episode. Some of the elders will remember that it was not until shortly after the close of the civil war that the last echo was heard of the dispute between Great Britain and the United States over territory in the northwest. The question of the ownership of the islands between Vancouver and Washington territory was still unsettled. The two governments in order not to lose prestige felt it necessary to maintain garrisons on the disputed grounds.

The United States was represented by one company of the old Ninth infantry, commanded by Second Lieut. Michael FitzGerald. FitzGerald was the only American commissioned officer in the field. Not far away from his headquarters were two companies of British regulars with a full complement of officers.

Before FitzGerald and his command were sent to the island, occupied in part by the British, Gen. McDowell, who commanded the division of the Pacific, sent for the second lieutenant for the purpose of impressing upon him the delicate nature of his mission.

"Above all things, Mr. FitzGerald," said the general, "observe the rules of international courtesy."

"I'll do it, general," answered the second lieutenant promptly, "and no war will grow out of my treatment of the red-coats."

The British and American garrisons were only a few miles apart. When Lieut. FitzGerald finally became comfortably fixed in his quarters and was feeling the full weight of being not only company commander but commanding officer of a United States garrison as well, he was called upon in turn by each of the half-dozen red-coated officers stationed beyond the hill. FitzGerald returned the calls promptly and shortly thereafter he was invited to dine with the six Englishmen as his hosts.

At that dinner the American lieutenant was entertained royally. There was nothing in the British garrison that was too good for him, and, as the veterans say to-day, "FitzGerald afterward told his comrades in the states, 'It was a wet night.'"

When FitzGerald returned to his quarters and three weeks had passed away he made up his mind that it was time to prepare to return in some way the hospitality of the Englishmen. He took an account of the provender at hand and found that the supply at his disposal were the ordinary army rations and a jug of whisky.

There was nothing fit for a banquet such as FitzGerald was to give, nearer than San Francisco. The second lieutenant was a man of expedients. The next boat to San Francisco carried some communications to certain supply houses, and not long afterward the supplies arrived at FitzGerald's quarters.

The American officer was no mere dinner giver. The invitations which he sent to the six British officers were engraved, bore the arms of the United States in colors and announced a banquet.

It took Lieut. FitzGerald a full week to unpack the boxes which had come from San Francisco. He told about 10 of his enlisted men that it would not do for an American officer to be outdone in hospitality by the British. Forthwith he instructed them carefully in duties as waiters. He picked out of the command five men who had some music in their souls and provided them with instruments.

When the British officers arrived and preliminary courtesies had been exchanged they were shown into a banquet hall with a table in its center glittering with silver and with cut glass. The red-coats ate of delicacies and of substantials that none of them thought could be found nearer than New York, and they drank wine of the kind that needs no bush.

There were two waiters for every guest, and five enlisted men fiddled away and blew at their instruments throughout the 20 courses of the dinner. There were toasts and toasts and toasts, and it was not all over until about an hour after the host had excused himself temporarily to attend reveille roll call.

Then came the cold gray light of the week after. The joy of remembrance of the banquet had kept Lieut. FitzGerald's heart up for the week that had passed. Then the bills came in from San Francisco. In amount they were $1,400. Second Lieut. FitzGerald's banquet had cost $200 a plate.

If the lieutenant should pay the bills the banquet would mean bankruptcy. The commanding officer of the island post passed a night in thought. In the morning there was a look of relief upon his face. In an hour's time there was ready for transmission to Gen. McDowell in San Francisco a large official envelope marked in large letters in red ink "International Courtesies."

Inclosed were the bills for pate de foie gras, rare old Burgundy and other things which never before had found their way to the northwestern coast. With the inclosures went this, written in Lieut. Michael FitzGerald's own hand: "Excerpt from Maj.-Gen. McDowell's instruction: 'Above all things, Mr. FitzGerald, observe the rules of international courtesies.'"

Gen. McDowell fumed, and tradition has it that he swore, but he ordered that the bills be paid out of the contingent fund, and the memory of that banquet in the wilds of one of the islands which now forms part of San Juan county, in the state of Washington, lives to this day in the minds of several veterans of the English service, and has a place in the story telling groups of the American army as "an international episode."

In Arlington cemetery, just across the Potomac from Washington lies the body of John G. Bourke, who in life was an officer of the fighting Third cavalry. Major Bourke's last tour of active duty was in Chicago during the railroad strike of 1894. The cavalryman found time aside from his soldier duties to study the folklore of the North American Indians with whom he fought and was friendly alternately, as the government would have it, for years on years of life in the west.

Major Bourke was an active member at one time of the American association which makes folklore study a specialty. He was interested not only in the inherited tribal tales of the Sioux and the Apache, but he took within his study scope the folklore of all primitive peoples.

Into the side of the great stone monument erected to the memory of Gen. Crook and which stands near Major Bourke's grave in Arlington cemetery is set a bronze panel showing the scene of the surrender of the Apaches under Geronimo to Crook in the Sierra Madres 23 years ago. The faces of the Indians and of the army officers shown are portraits. One of the officers in the group is John G. Bourke, and there is a story in connection with the folklore major and the Geronimo campaign which others besides folklore people possibly may appreciate.

There had been a fight at long range with the Apaches in the mountains and Bourke's troop, dismounted, had been engaged. When the fight was over and the Apaches who escaped killing had made for farther mountain fastnesses, as was their custom, the troopers moved forward and found one Indian who had been shot between the eyes, the bullet coming out at the back of his head. It is needless to say, perhaps, that the Apache brave was dead.

Gen. Crook came up and found Major, then Captain, Bourke saying a few warm things to one of the duty sergeants of his troop. Bourke left the sergeant, and Crook, turning to the cavalry captain, said: "Bourke, what on earth has Sergeant Casey been doing this time?"

"Doing, general!" exclaimed Bourke wrathfully. "Doing enough; I tried for five years to make a sharpshooter out of Casey, and at the end of the time he couldn't hit the barracks if he was inside with the doors and windows shut.

"And yet, general, that fellow Casey here to-day at a clean 900 yards plugged and killed the only Apache in this whole southwestern country who could have given me the folklore story I've been after for years.

"I tell you, general, that Casey has escaped court-martial only by swearing the shot was a scratch."

It takes only a casual reader of the army orders which are published daily in Washington to make it known that more than one deserter who has been caught succeeds in escaping the punishment due him by sheer force of the pleas, pathetic and otherwise, which friends make for him. Occasionally there are extenuating circumstances even in the cases of deserters; but desertion is desertion, no matter how it is viewed, and clemency is not looked upon with favor by either regimental or company commanders, and in truth the deserters generally escape punishment, when they do escape, through the soft-heartedness of civilian secretaries of war.

It is said that occasionally deserters write to the wife of the president of the United States asking that she intercede for them with her husband. This plan worked once, but if the facts in the case are known to the present mistress of the White House it is probable that the letters of deserters caught and awaiting trial will receive scant attention.

The story of a deserter who appealed to a president's wife, and he did not appeal in vain, is a Fort Sheridan story. In the year 1890, just as the snow was beginning to fly in the fall, a young fellow went from Chicago to Fort Sheridan and there gave himself up as a deserter It is probable that the cold weather and lack of money had much to do with the former soldier's surrender to the authorities.

The records were looked up and it was found that the man was what he declared himself to be—a deserter, and nothing less. He was locked in the guardhouse to await trial, and the waiting was not long, for a court-martial was convened and the result of the officers' deliberations was a sentence of four years in Fort Leavenworth for the prisoner.

Then it was that the deserter began to think he had been a fool to give himself up and he began to think of something else as well. It was just a week before Christmas when the prisoner sat down in has cell and wrote a letter to Mrs. Benjamin Harrison, White House, D. C. Afterward a fellow prisoner of the deserter said that he had been allowed to read the letter before it was sent to Washington and that it was such an appealing epistle that it made him weep. Mrs. Harrison was told how hard it was to be in prison during the glad Christmastide, when the world was bright from the reflection of happy faces, and when, if ever, pardon should come to the erring.

The president's wife received the letter and was so touched that she made it a point at once to interest her husband in the case. The result was that President Harrison pardoned the prisoner. The young fellow was released and by permission he stayed around the barracks at Fort Sheridan a few hours before leaving for Chicago.

When he left he carried away all the money which a sergeant of F company had been saving for a year to use on furlough. The pardoned one also took a gold watch belonging to the first sergeant of the same company.

That deserter never was caught, and as far as it is known he never again gave himself up to the authorities. There was more than a rumor at the time, however, that two enlisted men in the United States army saw to it that the tale of the deserter's deeds was sent to the White House in order that the president's wife might learn that even a woman and a president's wife may sometimes mistake human nature.

CONDENSED COURTESY.

Wise Club Member Wheatcaked German Baron Instead of Wineing and Dining Him.

A German baron—he said—blew into New York and got acquainted with some clubmen. He was put up at a club by one of them for the customary two weeks and paid his bills promptly.

There was great surprise when the man who put him up refused to make an application for a renewal of the courtesies of the club for the baron. Club members were indignant about it and one of them had a new card issued.

The baron appreciated the compliment and entertained lavishly. He left without paying his bills and the member who volunteered the second time had to settle.

"Did you lose anything?" he asked the man who had stood sponsor first time.

"No," he said. "I didn't wine and dine him, like you. I took him out one day and wheatcaked him."—Saturday Evening Post.

A BOOKMARK CHURCH.

In Japan, under the guidance of Rev. David S. Spencer as presiding elder, many of the native churches have been engaged in a strong effort toward self-support. The Toyohashi church was built of the proceeds of the sale of silk bookmarks made by the members of the congregation. These silk slips with tassels were sold by friends in other lands. Some of the workers made elegant embroidered silk handkerchiefs, which are also sent for sale among the people of the home land. The Japanese are showing themselves in labors and patience true types of the Christian.

Windy Wills.

As a contrast to the short will of E. H. Harriman, one might mention the will of the late Lord Grimthorpe, in the framing of which no fewer than 11,070 words were used; and that of Mr. Edward Bush, a retired Gloucester engineer, who died last autumn worth £114,813, and disposed, of it in a will containing 26,000 words.—Strand.

When the Wind Failed

By EDWARD HARRIS

(Copyright, by W. G. Chapman.)

The afternoon was extremely warm, even for the middle of June, month of roses. Occasionally a team rattled along the bluff, and the hoarse call of a steamer whistle echoed across the water. The white sails of many schooners, sloops and small boats of every sort dotted the sound.

About a mile from shore a little yacht was beating close up into the wind. Jack Elmore sat in the stern, with one hand on the tiller and the other braced behind him, his duck trousers shining in the sunlight and his blue tennis shirt setting off a tanned, good-looking face and muscular brown hands. He seemed almost to have forgotten the girl opposite him. But she did not resent his apparent indifference and was looking out over the water, evidently every bit as contented as her companion.

"The wind is dying away," he said. "We'll make one more tack out toward the reef and then go in. I don't feel like sculling this craft home."

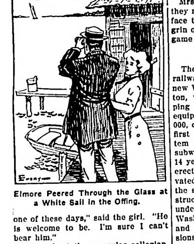
Eleanor looked over at him. "This is your last sail, isn't it?" she queried. "I'm sorry you have to go back to the city to-morrow. You are good company, Jack, though we always disagree so, and I shall miss you awfully." Elmore looked up, or rather down, from his vantage point.

"Miss me? Oh, I guess not. There are plenty of men here," he said with a smile.

"And I adore them all, I suppose?" she responded, dragging her hand through the water.

"Well, there's Emerson, the lawyer," he suggested.

"Who is entirely wrapt up in contemplation of his own cleverness and thinks he is going to be a great man one of these days," said the girl. "He is welcome to be. I'm sure I can't bear him."



Elmore Peered Through the Glass at a White Sail in the Offing.

"How about the muscular collegian, Beaumont?" he persisted.

"Who tries to write poetry and tells us twenty times a day how near he came to getting on the football team last season," Eleanor responded disdainfully. "I don't admire your selections, Jack."

"I only mention one more," said Elmore, "your friend the professor."

The girl colored. "Oh, you mean Mr. Lee," she rejoined rather hurriedly. Elmore was gazing at her intently. "He might be bearable if—if he wasn't so frightfully bashful. You think a great deal of him, don't you?"

"Well, rather. Lee was a great chum of mine in college and is a much finer fellow than you seem willing to admit," returned her companion.

Elmore turned the yacht's bow toward the shore. A hundred yards away a rowboat was gliding over the waves. Its occupant was a tall, stalwart young man who managed his oars skillfully.

"There goes Lee now," Elmore exclaimed. "He looks as if he had had a long pull. If I take him on board you will try not to eat him up, Eleanor, won't you?"

Eleanor laughed. She looked anything but a cannibal. So they hailed the oarsman and Lee's skiff was soon bobbing along behind the larger boat, while the new arrival sat perched on the side of the yacht, carrying on a rather desultory conversation with Eleanor. They were nearing the pier now, and the wind freshened a little, but Elmore's experienced eye could see that it was only a dying gasp. Nevertheless he swung the boat slowly around and started out toward the reef once more.

"Take the tiller a moment, Bob," said Elmore when they were about a mile from shore. "I want to fix that foremost sprit."

Lee took Elmore's place and the latter scrambled forward to the bow, where the sails hid him from view. Suddenly a splash was heard. It is a very simple thing to fall overboard when you want to—and can swim well. Jack found no trouble doing it quite naturally. Eleanor and Lee laughed unsuspectingly as Elmore's shining head appeared above the surface several yards astern. He climbed into Lee's boat and sat there dripping.

"You poor, clumsy fellow," cried the girl. "Sit still and we'll tow you in."

But Elmore objected; he wanted to row in, he said, to keep from catching cold, and at last Lee untied the rowboat painter and threw it to him. The wind was growing alarmingly light. Elmore pulled rapidly toward shore.

"Don't go out much further, Bob," he called back, "unless you want to row home."

He thought they seemed a trifle more sociable than they had been at first, and also noticed that the sails were only half filled with wind. He laughed softly as he tied his boat to the pier.

"Lee has his chance now," he remarked exultantly. "He told me he would ask Eleanor to marry him if he was given a good opportunity, and I fancy this interview ought to fix matters." Whistling joyously the archplotter started on a run for the hotel to change his wet garments. Half an hour later he joined Miss Russell's aunt and chaperon, Mrs. Minturn, on the pier.

"I thought Eleanor went sailing with you," observed that lady as he approached.

"So she did," replied Elmore, "but fate intervened and Prof. Lee took my place." He narrated the incidents of the trip and Mrs. Minturn smiled graciously. The professor was rather a favorite of hers.

"Perhaps you can make out whether that is their boat out yonder," she said, handing him a spyglass. "My eyes are so wretchedly weak that I can only see a short distance."

Elmore peered through the glass at a white sail in the offing, smiled and closed it after a short scrutiny. He had noticed that the heads of the two occupants were very close together and drew certain triumphant deductions therefrom.

"It's Eleanor and Lee all right," he said, "but I don't believe they'll be in for a good while yet. The wind has failed dead and Lee will probably have to use his oars unless the breeze springs up again. Suppose we walk up to the hotel; it's nearly supper time."

Mrs. Minturn nodded assent and they retraced their steps. On Elmore's face there lurked a furtive grin—the grin of one who has played a winning game with fortune.

Boston's Costly Subway.

The costliest mile of underground railway in the world is said to be the new Washington street subway of Boston, which passes through the shopping district. Its construction and equipment has amounted to $10,000,000, or about $2,000 a lineal foot. The first section of Boston's modern system of rapid transit, consisting of subway tunnels, was opened about 14 years ago. This was followed by the erection a few years later of the elevated road. And subsequently to that the system was extended by the construction of the East Boston tunnel under the harbor. The opening of the Washington tunnel marks the latest and one of the most important extensions.

Advises "Back to the Land."

There is just one way for the people of the city to find it possible to buy eggs, chickens, meat and flour for less money—that is for some of them to leave the city and go back to raising more hens, more cattle, and growing more wheat. The fact is that the country is getting top-heavy. The cities are calling too heavily on the producing areas. Farming is getting to be one of the most profitable businesses in the country, because the proportion of non-producers is getting so large. It is all a matter of supply and demand; just now the demand for foodstuffs is larger than it has ever been in proportion to the supply.—Denver Republican.

Boats Towed by Autos.

The first successful towing of canal boats by automobile was accomplished one recent Sunday on the Lehigh canal. Owing to the liability of the towline to snap in the effort to start, George B. Plummer, a Camden automobile expert, equipped a seven-ton motor truck of 45 horsepower with spiral springs. Six barges with 800 tons of cargo were taken from Allentown to Bethlehem in an hour. Present lock capacity and speed limitations considered, it is estimated that automobiles compared with mules will handle double the number of boats in half the time.—Philadelphia Record.

First Honeymoon in Air.

Even the honeymoon in the air is not a new idea. M. Flammarion, the distinguished French astropomer and aeronaut, took his bride for a honeymoon trip in a balloon on August 28, 1874. Mme. Flammarion relates that though she had never been in a balloon before she felt no trepidation when she took her seat in the car along with her husband and his scientific instruments, at the gas works of La Villette. They were accompanied by M. Flammarion's brother and the aeronaut, M. Jules Godard.

Victory Over Tuberculosis.

That the war on tuberculosis pays immediate dividends in human life is proved by a report of Dr. Bosley, health commissioner of Baltimore. In the monthly health bulletin for July it is shown that the number of deaths from tuberculosis occurring in the city was 92, as compared with 133 for the same month last year.

MASTOID PROCESS NEW RING BLOW

KETCHEL UNCORKS A SMASH LIKE THE SOLAR PLEXUS AND CORKSCREW.

JEFFRIES ONLY HOPE NOW

Big Boiler-Maker Seems to Be the One Man Who Can Take the Championship Away from Jack Johnson, the Giant Black.

When Bob Fitzsimmons smashed his right hand against Jim Corbett's body just beneath the heart in the memorable battle at Carson City, March 17, 1897, and won the championship of the world the "solar plexus" blow came into fame.

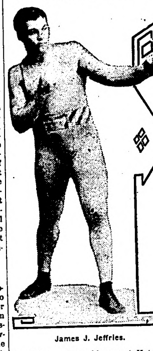
Incidentally, it was Mrs. Fitzsimmons who helped in no small way to make the blow famous. She sat at the ringside and saw "Gentleman Jim" pick her husband to pieces with his jabs and counters, while Bob was trying in vain to land a haymaker on the jaw.

"Smash him in the slats, Bob," she shouted to her husband. Bob heard the voice and shifted his attack from the head to the body and the result is ring history.

A few years later, the foxy Kid McCoy brought out the "corkscrew punch" and used it with telling effect in his battles.

Now it is the "mastoid process blow," and although the new punch hasn't won any championships, it has had the effect of bringing the present champion, Jack Johnson, to the mat. It was Stanley Ketchel, the middleweight champion, who thought he could whip the giant Texan, that put the "mastoid process" smash into the limelight. He got licked for doing it.

In the twelfth round of the battle Ketchel made one of his wild swings. The blow landed behind Johnson's left ear, where the mastoid process is located. Johnson fell and the crowd, which sympathized with the white man, thought it was all over. But Johnson sprang to his feet and waded in. Three mighty blows put Ketchel out and the fight was over.



James J. Jeffries.

Now the question is: "Will Jim Jeffries try to reach Johnson's mastoid process when the alfalfa king and the former cotton bale hustler meet, as they seem certain to do? Physicians say negro fighters are easy to whip if a good blow lands on the mastoid process, the bump behind the ear. Knowing that Johnson is weak in that section, the mighty James, who had to quit the ring because there was none good enough to give him a decent battle, and is only returning to the squared circle because a negro holds the championship, may be seen trying to plant his right on the mastoid process. If he does—well, let's wait and see what does happen.

Johnson showed in the battle with Ketchel that no middleweight has any chance to whip him, although there are some who believe Sam Langford, the black demon from Boston, could turn the trick. However, strictly speaking, Langford is not a middleweight and could hardly make the weight and be strong enough to put up a good battle.

So it's up to Jeffries. The giant boiler-maker has returned from Europe and reports say he is in better condition than he has enjoyed in years. Johnson has stage fever again and if the two men come together it is not likely that they will fight before February. Offers of all kinds of purses have been made but it is likely that Jimmy Coffroth's Colma ring will be the scene of the battle.

Corbett says Jeffries will win. It is a fact that about seven-tenths of the predictions by former champions concerning the probable outcome of a big battle go wrong. Will it be the case with the Jeffries-Johnson scrap? Time will tell.

Set a New Auto Mark.

A new mark for a circular track was made at the Brighton Beach automobile races when Cyrus Patscheke and Ralph Mulford, who alternated in the Lozier, No. 3, covered 1,196 miles in 24 hours.

"Is that all you have to say to me?" she queried, looking off into space.

"Great heavens, girl" said he, abashed, "what more can I say? Haven't I told you that I worship the very ground you walk on? Haven't I offered you every iota of my worldly possessions? Haven't I said that you would never want for anything, that your relatives could come and stay as long as they wished, that I would work my fingers bare for you, and that I would devote my entire existence to you?"

"Oh, yes, you said all that," she replied, wearily, "but—"

"But what?" he asked, tremulously.

"You—you didn't say right out and out 'I love you,' and that's what I wanted to hear most of all."

A Clean Man

Outside cleanliness is less than half the battle. A man may scrub himself a dozen times a day, and still be unclean. Good health means cleanliness not only outside, but inside. It means a clean stomach, clean bowels, clean blood, a clean liver, and new, clean, healthy tissues. The man who is clean in this way will look it and act it. He will work with energy and think clean, clear, healthy thoughts.

He will never be troubled with liver, lung, stomach or blood disorders. Dyspepsia and indigestion originate in unclean stomachs. Blood diseases are found where there is unclean blood. Consumption and bronchitis mean unclean lungs.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery

prevents these diseases. It makes a man's insides clean and healthy. It cleans the digestive organs, makes pure, clean blood, and clean, healthy flesh.

It restores tone to the nervous system, and cures nervous exhaustion and prostration. It contains no alcohol or habit-forming drugs.

Constipation is the most unclean uncleanliness. Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets cure it. They never gripe. Easy to take as candy.

MASTERING GREAT FOREST PROBLEMS

GENERAL GRANT: 106 FEET IN CIRCUMFERENCE

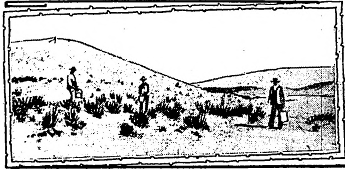
MASTERY by the forest service of one of the greatest practical forest problems ever undertaken by any government is advancing apace. Briefly stated, that problem is to develop to its highest usefulness a total area of 168,000,000 acres of wild lands, mainly mountain wilderness, but closely related to the welfare of the entire country.

From an administrative standpoint the most striking fact of the year was the remarkable increase which took place in the actual use of the forests by the public. This increase is partly brought out by the following statement:

	Per Cent.
Increase in area	11
Increase in number of timber sales	236
Increase in amount of timber cut	102
Increase in number of free-timber permits	76
Increase in number of special-use permits	67
Increase in number of grazing permits	11

Regarded as property, the national forests justify liberal expenditures for their protection and improvement. At $2 per thousand feet stumpage the merchantable timber alone forms, just as it stands, an asset worth something like $800,000,000, while the very moderate grazing charge yielded the government last year an income of nearly $1,000,000. It is a safe prediction that within 20 years the forests will bring in from the sale of timber alone an annual net income of as many millions of dollars.

An average wood production of 30 cubic feet to the acre of commercial forest is a moderate estimate of what will ultimately be obtained under management. One hundred million acres of such forest would allow to be cut each year over 3,000,000,000 cubic feet, or from 20,000,000,000 to 25,000,000,000 board feet, without diminution of the supply. This is but a fraction of the country's consumption of wood at the present time, but at the stumpage prices which already obtain in the older and better settled parts of the United States its sale would bring the government each year from $80,000,000 to $125,000,000.



DISTRIBUTING PRAIRIE-DOG POISON ON THE RANGES

Were it wise to do so, the receipts from the forests could very easily be made not only to keep pace with the expenditures, but to return to the government the entire cost of maintaining the forest service. Private owners of grazing lands in the same regions ask and receive a very much higher return per head of stock for the use of their lands than does the forest service. The national forests, which contain one-fifth of the standing merchantable timber in the country, furnished last year about 1.3 per cent. of its lumber cut, resulting in the removal from the forests of about one-eighth of one per cent. of the stand. Of this comparatively insignificant cut, one-fourth was not sold, but was given to home-builders and communities; yet the sales brought in nearly $900,000. If the chief object of the forests were to produce immediate income, the amount received could be multiplied several times. There is actually going to waste in the woods each year, through decay and other natural causes, from five to ten times the amount of timber now being cut.

With an adequate force of forest officers available much of this waste might be prevented. Timber sales involve, for marking, scaling and supervising the work, a cost to the government of about 30 cents per thousand feet, and the amount sold cannot be much increased without an increased appropriation. There is also the waste of the productive power of the forest, which cannot be brought into full play until the mature trees have been removed to make room for a growing crop.

Most of the forest timber is beyond reach unless heavy outlays are made to obtain means of transportation. Such timber can be sold only to those who command large resources of capital, and even then only at a relatively low price. On the other hand, where the demand for the timber is good and competition for its purchase fairly brisk, it is generally necessary to go slowly because of the certainty of future requirements. In short, the question of the timber that can safely or wisely be sold is a local one. The fact that timber is rotting in the woods in distant regions will not help communities which find their home supply exhausted.

For these reasons the sales of national forest timber are carefully guarded. The amount of national forest timber sold during the year was slightly over 386,000,000 feet, or not much over one-third the amount sold the previous year. The falling off was directly due to the refusals to make large sales. Under such sales the actual cutting is allowed to extend over several years. The amount of timber cut and paid for during the year, however, more than doubled the cut of the previous year, with a total of not quite 393,000,000 feet. The receipts from timber sales were about $850,000, as against not quite $670,000 for the previous year. In addition there was cut under free use over 130,000,000 feet of timber, valued at about $170,000.

The timber lands of the west, outside of the national forests, are mainly in strong hands. Were the national forest timber offered on the market to every purchaser, the main scene of western lumbering would be quickly shifted to the public holdings. It is sometimes asserted that the creation of the national forests has played into the hands of monopolists of timber lands. It was, on the contrary, an eleventh hour halting of the process which would have made the hold obtainable by such a monopoly complete. To permit the owners of standing timber to preserve their stumpage intact while supplying their business needs through purchase from the government would simply invite the hoarding of private timber for further high prices, while the public supply would be disposed of without an adequate return.

Under the timber-sale policy now in force both the present and the future interests of the consumer are borne in mind. The needs of those dependent on the forests are supplied up to the limit set by the power of the region to maintain a steady yield. It is recognized, also, that the removal of mature timber to make room for a new and growing crop is the only way by which the forests can be put to work. Small sales are, however, preferred to large sales, and large sales which would tend to expose the consumer to monopoly prices are uniformly refused. Requests made by prospective bidders for the advertising of over $2,400,000 worth of timber were refused during the past year.

One result of this policy has been to bring about a decline in the average price of the stumpage sold. In general higher prices are obtainable through large than through small sales. The most important consideration in making sales of timber, however, is not the price obtainable, but the serving of the public interest. Obviously, to sell timber in quantity at less than the market price through any other method than competitive bids would simply work to the profit of specially favored individuals; but care must be taken at the same time both to prevent local consumers from being overcharged by those who buy stumpage from the government and to prevent the exaction of a monopoly price for stumpage by the government.

TURPENTINING IN GEORGIA

LARGE FALLEN CHESTNUT IN THE APPALACHIANS

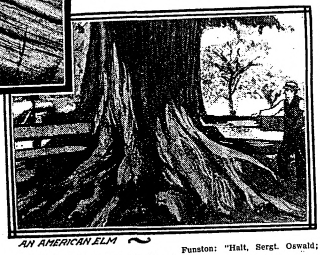
The work completed during the year included 3,400 miles of trails, 3,200 miles of telephone line, 100 miles of wagon road, 40 miles of fire line, 250 bridges, 550 cabins and barns and 600 miles of pasture and drift fences. In addition to the sum provided by the special improvement fund, over $100,000 from the general fund of the service was turned from current expenses to defray the cost of this work, but much of the work planned and urgently needed could not be carried out because there was nothing with which to pay for it.

The fire record also deserves mention. Since the fiscal year ends in the midst of the fire season, reports of fires are made not for fiscal but for calendar years. During the calendar year 1907 the loss of timber by fire was less than half that of the previous year, though this in turn was less than ever before. About one-seventh of one per cent. of the forests was burned over in 1907, with a damage so slight as to be practically negligible. The ratio of loss to the value of the timber protected, allowing that it is worth $2 per thousand feet, was about as four cents to $1,000. The entire cost of national forest administration was equivalent to a charge of one-third of one per cent. on the value of the timber protected—surely a cheap insurance rate.

This immunity from fires must be ascribed chiefly to the results of consistent efforts made in the past to inform the public as to the danger of carelessness in the use of fires in the forest and to the recognized necessity of vigilance to put out small fires. With reasonable co-operation on the part of the public to prevent fires and reasonable provision for discovering and fighting fires when they start, really heavy losses are entirely preventable. The widespread forest fires of recent months are a case in point. Relatively little damage was done to the national forests at a time when the air was thick with smoke from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, and most of the national forest loss which was suffered, amounting to perhaps $1,000,000, was due solely to the fact that the area to be protected is so vastly out of proportion to the resources at the disposal of the forest service.

Examinations of lands under the act of June 11, 1906, led to the listing for settlement of about 240,000 acres of national forest land.

Reforesting of large areas of the national forest is called for primarily in the interest of the water supply of the west, but also, though less pressingly, for the sake of an enlarged timber supply. Broadcast sowings were made during the year in 27 forests, in eight states, to test by experiment the extent to which reforestation may be hoped for through the use of this method. The national forest nurseries, in which are being grown stock for transplanting, were enlarged and about 700,000 trees were planted. Over 2,000,000 trees will be ready for planting in 1909.



AN AMERICAN ELM

The beneficial results of regulated grazing, shown in a decided betterment of much of the national forest range, made it possible to increase the allotment of stock on a number of the older forests. At the same time investigations in range improvement through reseeding, new methods of handling stock, the eradication of poisonous plants and the destruction of prairie dogs brought important progress toward still better future use of the forests by stockmen. The development of watering places is another means that is being pursued to the same end, while the killing of predatory wild animals by forest service hunters saved the stockmen losses probably greater than the entire amount paid in grazing fees. This amount was over $960,000. Through the enforcement of quarantine regulations and the distribution of blackleg vaccine other losses from disease were prevented.

Through co-operation with private owners investigations in forest management and forest planting were continued. It was possible to make field examinations of only about one-fifth of the total acreage for which advice concerning forest management was sought. Every tract of land on which the advice of the service is applied becomes a valuable experiment in practical forestry. The total area for which examinations have been made since co-operation was first offered is nearly 11,000,000 acres, and on more than three fourths of this some form of forestry is now in actual practice.

The studies in wood preservation and in the strength and physical properties of different kinds of wood maintained the position of the forest service as leader toward more economical use of wood material. Special attention was given to working out practicable methods for treating farm timbers in small quantities. Studies in wood-pulp making showed that a merchantable pulp can be made from 15 woods not commonly used. Along many other lines also data were gathered looking to better knowledge and control of our forests and better use of their products. At the same time the work of bringing to the attention of the public the knowledge gathered for the use of the public was vigorously prosecuted.

HOW FUNSTON SWAM BAG-BAG.

Col. Ed Little is Author of New Story on the Little General.

Col. Ed Little is said to be the author of this story of how Funston swam the Bag-Bag.

One of the brave fellows in the Twentieth Kansas was Sergt. Oswald, a great big fellow and somewhat of a favorite of Col. Funston's. The regiment had reached the bank of the river and had halted, out of danger. Then this dialogue is said to have ensued:

Col. Funston: "Sergt. Oswald, go and ascertain the depth of the river below."

The sergeant saluted and replied: "Very well, sir," and proceeded into the water.

"How deep is the water, Sergt. Oswald?" asked the general.

"Six inches, Col. Funston," replied the sergeant.

Funston: "Advance, Sergt. Oswald," and the sergeant advanced.

Funston: "Halt, Sergt. Oswald; how deep is the river?"

Oswald: "Eleven inches, Col. Funston."

"Advance, Sergt. Oswald," and the sergeant advanced.

"How deep now, Sergt. Oswald?"

"Seven inches, Col. Funston."

Funston (rising to his feet with his sword in hand): "We'll swim er, by heck!"—Kansas City Times.

THE RACK AND THE SWEATBOX.

The modern police "sweatbox," for which there is no warrant, either lay or ecclesiastical, replaces the rack, which passed out of use in England soon after the assassination of that witty and wicked profligate, the duke of Buckingham, at Portsmouth, by John Felton. This noted assasination occurred on Saturday, August 23, 1628.

Felton underwent several examinations, always asserting that he had no accomplices, and when the earl of Dorset threatened in the king's name to examine him on the rack he said: "I do again affirm, upon my salvation, that my purpose was known to no man living; and more than I have said before I cannot. But if it be his majesty's pleasure, I am ready to suffer whatever his majesty will have inflicted upon me. Yet this I must tell you, by the way, that if I be put upon the rack, I will accuse you, my lord Dorset, and none but yourself."

This bold resolve astounded the examiners. They hesitated and consulted the judges, who unanimously replied that "torture was not justifiable under the laws of England."

THE LATE ENGLISH HARVEST

THE HAPPY AUTUMN DAYS

SOMETHING WRONG

WHAT one saw when going through England in the early days of September was harvest in full swing. Those were fortunate who were able to take advantage of the brief glimpses of sunshine and dry weather to house their crops. It is characteristic of the very dry season that the stalks have less strength than usual, and are, therefore easily beaten down by the wind and rain, with little power of recovery left them. So long did they lie, in fact, that in many cases the weeds grew up through the corn and produced a matted tangle which no mechanical reaper could deal with. In consequence, therefore, the country was scoured for harvesters, casual laborers, men, village women, and even children were hastily engaged so that it has been common to see bands of shearers at work exactly as they might have been seen 60 years ago. Many were hoping that September would bring some settled weather, and occasionally it has appeared as though blue skies and wind were to predominate, but the hope proved illusory. Clouds quickly drifted across the sky and torrents of rain fell upon the "kindly fruits of the earth." Harvest therefore, proved a tedious, difficult and costly business, and, unfortunate, the financial outlook is darkened at the same time. Before the corn was practically ripe it looked better than we had reason to expect, as the wet had produced an enormous growth of straw. If by any chance there had come a good period of sunshine it is possible that the ears would have filled well; but from the reports of those who have threshed a portion of their in-gathering it seems to be practically certain that the harvest will be light in grain. With the proof of this comes the intelligence of a serious drop in prices. Of course something of the kind had been expected and was discounted beforehand. During the late spring and early summer, when exceptionally high prices prevailed for wheat, the English farmer was only a looker-on at the game, and to some extent perhaps a sufferer. Yet the situation is not without its consoling features. The price is still good for September, and shows what to the grower must be a gratifying increase of price realized since last year. The movement that began with the century is, therefore, being carried steadily on. It is described in the agricultural statistics for 1908. Since the beginning of the century the price of wheat has shown a distinct tendency to a higher level than that which characterized the closing years of the last century.

Farmers will be well advised not to send their wheat to market at present, as prices are almost invariably at their lowest in September, and there is every reason for thinking that they will increase considerably.

The long-talked-of effect which the extended use of motor cars is producing has now become perfectly visible. In the volume of statistics for 1908 there is a new table which sheds an interesting light upon this side of the problem. This is a list of the contract prices of hay and straw at Colney Hatch and Hanwell asylums in the years from 1893 to 1908; 1893 and 1894 were times of great scarcity, and accordingly we find extraordinarily high prices ruling. But in 1895 prices were resuming their normal. Last year and the year before we find that prices had fallen very considerably. It is the same with straw. In a year like the present, when straw is extremely abundant, this becomes a very serious consideration, and there would seem to be no getting out of the fact that in future years the value of fodder will continue to diminish. One sees the law working obviously enough in practice, especially in the neighborhood of London. There used to be men who made their livelihood by purchasing hay and other foodstuffs for the purpose of converting them into fodder for the bus and tramway horses of London. To a large extent these latter have ceased to exist, and their place has been taken by motors, which consume no corn, and thus tend to the impoverishment of the farmer. Another complaint frequently made about the motor is that it is causing a serious diminution in the supply of manure that used to be obtained from towns. Railway companies carried on the whole at very reasonable rates manure from stables and streets in town to the agricultural districts. The motor has already effected a great change in that respect and is continuing to do so. It gives back to the land nothing in the shape of manure, and thus indirectly tends to make cultivation a little more expensive than it used to be. In spite of all this, there is no reason to believe that agriculture is entering on a period of depression. On the contrary, it is emerging steadily from the dullness that has characterized it for more than a quarter of a century. The present disappointment arises only from the extravagant hopes raised in the early part of the year. The general record is one of steady improvement; but whether prices go up or down in a climate such as ours, an occasional bad season will always have to be reckoned with. The present year, taking it altogether, has been unfavorable to the cultivation of the soil. Yet it will be noticed that there are very few farms to let, and that land usually brings a satisfactory price in the market. For this we have to thank mainly that great crowd of wheat consumers which has arisen in the east and created a demand that the supply does no more than satisfy at present and that is continually growing. The sale of the farmer's produce, too, can be effected in a less expensive manner, thanks to the multiplications of auction marts, while the telegraph and telephone enable him to ascertain what demand there is before he delivers his goods for sale, so that much of the uncertainty that formerly prevailed is eliminated. Further, there is continuously going on an increase in the number of consumers and an improvement in the standard of living. two influences which in combination tend towards the yielding of a greater return by food products.

New Scientific Appliance.

A recent peculiar bit of engineering work at Netherton, Eng., was made possible by a new scientific appliance. At the Pearson furnaces the piston rod of a large vertical blowing engine was so bent in an accident that its removal from the cylinder seemed impossible. The director of an oxygen supply company was called, and by means of the oxyhydrogen cutting blowpipe the piston rod—seven inches in diameter—was cut off close to the gland of the cylinder, the operation occupying only 35 minutes. The task was a very difficult one, as the cut had to be made at considerable height overhead, with the burning metal dropping down and repeatedly setting fire to the wooden stage necessary.

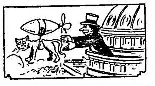
Tragedy and Romance of the Dome



WASHINGTON.—The great white United States capitol building is a sort of central magnet of great power which attracts many queer people from all sections of this broad land. Capt. J. P. Megrew, a union war veteran with a splendid record, is in command of the capitol police force, and the peculiar people who flock to the big building come under his observation.

Away back in the '70s, before Capt. Megrew became chief of the capitol police, the "tragedy of the dome" occurred. A young Catholic priest, who had become demented from overstudy, ascended to the platform just below the Goddess of Liberty, more than 259 feet above terra firma, and plunged headlong into space. In striking the thick copper sheathing of roofing over the rotuna the body made a deep indentation in the metal, which is now pointed out to visitors by the capitol guides.

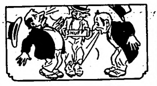
Next to the tragedy of the dome is a recent occurrence which is designated as "the romance of the dome." A young couple secured permission from Capt. Megrew to be married beneath the great bronze Goddess of Liberty on the lofty congress steeple. A preacher tendered his services, and the novel ceremony was performed in mid-air beneath the goddess with two capitol policemen and a sprinkling of visitors as witnesses.

Then comes the "comedy of the dome." An eccentric fellow who had invented a parachute made an ineffectual effort to test his invention by sending down from the dome several of his parachutes with cats attached to them. He was evidently afraid to risk his own precious life, so decided to use felines. His purpose was thwarted by the capitol police, re-enforced by the Washington Humane society.

Statuary hall is one of the most interesting apartments in the capitol. It contains the stone and bronze statues of a number of Americans, distinguished alike in war and peace; famous generals, statesmen, explorers and diplomats—contributed to the general government by the several states, each state selecting its most illustrious sons.

Included among these statues are those of George Washington and Thomas H. Benton of Missouri, Daniel Webster and Gen. Starke of New Hampshire, Robert Fulton, inventor of the steamboat, and H. H. Muhlenburg of Pennsylvania; Ethan Allen of Vermont, Cass of Michigan, Gen. James A. Garfield and Allen of Ohio, Roger Sherman of Connecticut, John Jay of New York, Richard Stockton and the dashing Gen. Phil Kearney of New Jersey, Abraham Lincoln, Gen. Shields of Missouri, Jacques Marquette, the priest explorer; Senator Kenney, West Virginia, and Clinton of New York.

Snuff Takers of the U. S. Senate



THERE are two snuff takers in the United States senate, Mr. Overman of North Carolina and Mr. Carter of Montana. For the benefit of these two men the senate still maintains the official snuff boxes, which are kept carefully with fresh material for producing sneezes.

These boxes are little lacquered affairs about four inches long, two and a half inches wide and an inch deep, and are fastened by screws to the top of the projecting ledge, one on each side of the vice-president's dais.

The snuff is purchased by the sergeant-at-arms in four eight pound jars, at a cost of 75 cents a pound, and it takes an average of about five pounds a year to replenish the boxes twice a week during the sessions. The work of refilling the boxes was for years one of the duties ceremoniously performed by the late Capt. Bassett, the venerable assistant doorkeeper of the senate and inveterate user of the powdered weed; but since his death, five years ago, the task has fallen to the lot of one of the pages, who, naturally, does not bestow upon it the loving care of his aged predecessor.

Capt. Bassett when he died had completed nearly sixty years of continuous service in the senate, and was almost the sole relic of the days when the use of snuff was general in that body. For many years before his death his dignified, almost ceremonious, manner of indulging in the habit excited the wonder and awe of the modern page.

He was very proud of a gold snuff box presented to him by the senators upon the fortieth anniversary of his entry into their service, and he kept it filled with a choice brand of the powder. He carried it in a tail pocket of the frock coat in which he always appeared, and the force of his habit of reaching for it caused a laugh at his expense.

It was during the troublous times attending the Hayes-Tilden contest, and it was thought best that Capt. Bassett, as custodian of one of the boxes containing the disputed electoral votes, should be armed. He was accordingly provided with a revolver, which he carried in the pocket of the empty coattail.

As the procession was about to start on the march from senate to the house Capt. Bassett was asked if he had his revolver with him.

"Yes," he replied, "here it is," and, diving into the wrong pocket, he produced not the revolver, but his cherished gold snuff box.

There had been threats of attacking the procession on the way to the house, and the members of the party were in rather a sober frame of mind, but the tension was relaxed for the moment by the laughter which was caused by the mistake.

Perhaps the most noted of the senators who were addicted to snuff within the memories of the old employes was the late Allen G. Thurman of Ohio. Mr. Thurman was a frequent visitor of the official snuff box on the Democratic side.

Vice-President Wilson, who died in his room at the capitol, was another noted patron of the senate snuff box, and so was Senator Edmunds of Vermont.

Uncle Sam Worried Over $10 Error

REWARD FOR ADDRESS OF G.W. WEART.

TIME and money are being expended every day by the government in efforts to locate claimants against the United States. For months the post office department has been directing a search for George W. Weart, one time postmaster at Deal Beach, N. J., to whom is due $10.

On June 15, 1905, a registered package was mailed by Mrs. Estelle Rosett to Mrs. E. D. Ledgerman of Deal Beach. The package was reported lost and the valuation, $10, was paid by Postmaster Weart. Subsequently post office inspectors discovered that the package had been delivered to the addressee and the records mislaid.

When the facts were disclosed every effort was made by the department to return the amount to Postmaster Weart. He had moved from Deal Beach to Hood River, Ore. Inquiry showed that he had died there. An effort to locate his heirs proved unavailing. Neither of his two sons could be located, although they both were traced by post office inspectors from place to place. The search already has cost the department several times the amount of the original loss, but the disbursing office of the department still has the check ready for delivery to Weart's estate if his heirs can be located.

The Wall Flowers.

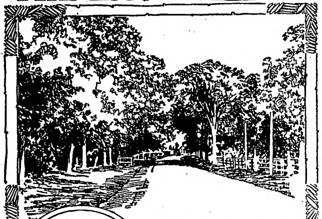
"They are as bitter," laughed Senator Beveridge anent two candidates, "as the two ladies at the Hallowe'en party.

"The younger lady said spitefully, as she sat beside the other during a waltz—they were both wall-flowers—

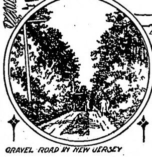
"'I wonder, dear, if I shall lose my looks, too, when I get to be your age?'

"'You'll be lucky if you do,' snapped the older lady."

GOOD ROADS IN THE EAST



BITUMEN ROAD NEAR BOSTON



GRAVEL ROAD IN NEW JERSEY

THE greatest public service corporation in the United States to-day is the Highway Improvement association, said James H. McDonald, state highway commissioner of Connecticut, at the dinner given him on the private car Signet by the members of the B. F. Yoakum good roads party at New Haven a few days ago. After a trip of 1,500 miles by motor car and 5,000 miles by train through 17 states the members of the party were disposed to agree with him. They were all farmers from the great southwest—Texas, Oklahoma, Louisiana and Arkansas—and they had just finished a motor car tour of Maryland, New Jersey, New York and the New England states in search of good roads.

This trip will have tangible and immediate results. The delegation from the southwestern states returned home full of enthusiasm for good roads. They promised collectively and individually to devote their efforts to promoting a cause for which they learned $100,000,000 already had been expended in this country, and little states like New Hampshire and Connecticut were appropriating millions of dollars. Within a few years the southwestern states will have good roads.

The first actual work of road inspection in company with state engineers was in New Jersey, where the farmers found roads ranging in cost from $3,500 to $29,000 a mile. They traveled over roads made entirely of gravel and crushed by heavy steam rollers. They found these roads good for wagon traffic, but that heavy motor service wore them out. The average bitumen road over which they passed cost from $5,000 to $7,000 a mile, and furnished very satisfactory service for both motor and wagon traffic. They had been laid down in quite a lot of different ways ranging from 25 per cent. asphaltum, 25 per cent. tar and the rest in gravel and sand up to a very high percentage of asphalt. The New Jersey engineers recommended the lower percentage of asphaltum, as they do not get slippery in hot or rainy weather.

The next state visited by the investigating committee of southwestern farmers was New Hampshire. They were welcomed at Laconia by Gov. Henry B. Quinby, who told them that the state had appropriated $17,000,000 for good roads at the last session of the legislature; and then proceeded over parts of the three great trunk roads which are being built through the state, in company with A. W. Dean, state engineer, and his assistants.

They found the macadam roads in Massachusetts, and later in New York, in which the upper course is mixed with tar, costing from $8,000 to $9,000 per mile. This combination makes an extremely sound road for both wagon and motor traffic. It is customary to oil the surface of these roads from time to time in the spring and fall. As cold weather comes on they cease this oiling, as extreme cold is apt to produce a bad surface under heavy traffic conditions.

At the conclusion of their first day in Massachusetts the party tendered a dinner in Boston to Lieut. Gov. Frothingham. Among those present was W. E. McClintock, chairman of the Chelsea board of control, who had been for 15 years previous connected with the Massachusetts state highway commission, and for 12 years of that time chairman of that body. He spoke enthusiastically upon the subject of good roads and said in part:

I know of several instances where the highways have been so improved that where it formerly took two horses all day to haul one ton it now takes one horse only half a day to haul two tons. You can figure out the percentage of profit for yourselves. The load on improved roads has increased 20 to 50 and 75 per cent., and the horsepower is reduced.

Farmers and state granges are enthusiastic advocates of the good roads movement in this state and recommend the continuation of the appropriations.

Then these men from the southwestern states heard about something real in the way of appropriations from Col. W. D. Schier, chairman of the Massachusetts state highway commission. They learned also that all the products used in bitumen construction in the east are coming from the western states. Oklahoma and Texas should abound in these natural oil products used in the construction of the best roads known to the science of road building in the east. They learned that the cost of these materials is much lower in the west than it is, for example, in Massachusetts. The Massachusetts highway commission is forced to pay from 30 to 40 per cent. more than the same material can be procured for in Oklahoma and Texas. Col. Schier said in part:

A foundation is necessary for a road good 12 months in the year. Here in Massachusetts we appropriate $2,500,000 in five-year terms, and spend $300,000 a year. When we build through townships they pay us back 25 per cent. of our outlay.

We have spent $7,500,000 dollars in building state highways amounting to a little less than 800 miles of road. We spend $25,000 a year in towns of less than a million valuation, with no percentage paid back. This road, where the township asks for the money, is constructed under the specifications of the state highway commission.

The greatest necessity in road building is to keep the roads in repair. We must arrange for maintenance as well as construction. This is where Massachusetts is ahead of the other states. Our materials are oil, sand and gravel.

"Why," exclaimed J. P. Connors of Oklahoma, "we have 125,000 acres of asphaltum and oil in Oklahoma that has belonged to nobody except for a year or two."

The party concluded its trip through Rhode Island by a 25-mile dash from Narragansett Pier to Westerly in 45 minutes, giving a practical demonstration of the value of good roads when you desire to catch a train.

Extending Wireless Telegraphy.

The latest innovation in wireless telegraphy is the construction of an underground station in Paris. It is being erected in the Champ de Mars and will probably be open for use next month. The station will be fitted up on the latest approved lines and comprise a machine room, a transmitting pole and accommodation for the officials. By the introduction of a 100-horsepower engine it is hoped that messages may be exchanged with places about 5,000 miles distant. The result of the experiment will be awaited with much interest.

WOMAN'S CRUELTY TO WOMAN.

It is often said that women are more cruel in their judgments of women than are men. The sophomores of Barnard college, New York, have evidently undertaken to show that the sex can be as cruel in action as in judgment. Only women will fully appreciate the terrific cruelty of the edict of those girl sophomores that the girl freshmen must on no account adorn themselves with rats or puffs or braids during the present college term. But the man of average observation will get at least a hint of the tragedy of the situation. While the sophomores are going about adorned in the glory of mountainous false hair the freshmen will have to be content with those simple coiffures at once so becoming to the faces of young girls and so out of style at present, says the Chicago Inter Ocean. Think of the horror of that to girls who are just beginning to understand the inexorableness of fashion! And when they walk abroad for air or exercise what sudden, sad reminders of their forlorn condition the windows filled with abundant hair goods of all shapes and arrangements are sure to be! What pangs of hopeles desperation and revolt will wake to mar their pleasuro!

Omaha dealers are said to be rushing butter to the cold storage warehouses and predicting that consumers will be paying 50 cents a pound for the product before Christmas. It does not require a long head, nowadays, to see that butter will be higher in price in winter than in summer; in fact, from time immemorial butter has always advanced during the winter months. But when there were no cold storage warehouses the prices of butter were lower at this time of the year because there were no speculators buying the product up, right and left, rushing it to the cooler, and predicting tremendous advances during the winter. The cold storage warehouse is beneficent in many ways, but the speculative feature of its utilization has raised the summer prices of butter and eggs and poultry, and also boosted the winter rates for these products. None of these products will ever again sell long at low prices, because the moment the prices ease a little the speculator jumps in and clears the market of the surplus.

It is too early to form conclusions about American traits. The United States is not the only country that has shown assimilative powers. England, on a lesser scale, has engaged in the work with signal success, says the San Francisco Chronicle. At times she has absorbed relatively large numbers of foreigners and completely Anglicized them, but at present her native-born population is so much greater than her foreign that the latter is insignificant by comparison. It is possible, therefore, to speak of British traits with some degree of propriety.

The desertion at New York of 200 seamen of Admiral Seymour's fleet repeats what occurred at Hampton Roads on the occasion of the Jamestown exposition. The British "Jack Tar" finds conditions ashore in the United States so alluring that he is tempted to abandon his ship and violate the obligation incurred by the acceptance of the "Queen's shilling." The French fleet lost only a few men, probably because of language difficulties which Britons do not encounter, and because affiliations with them are not so readily established.

Reports of 6,061 cases of appendicitis in Berlin during 1907 destroy a foreign impression that this trouble is an "American disease." Detailed reports on Berlin hospital cases bear out the American surgical claim that early operations reduce the mortality rate. By such evidence from an old world center of authority the alien criticism should be still further modified that American surgeons are too ready with the knife.

Indisputably the materials of subsistence cost more than a year ago. A dispatch from Washington notes that last year the average cost to the government of food supplies for the army was on the basis of 19.65 cents for a soldier's daily ration, whereas now it is 21.5 cents. At this rate the market bill for the whole army for the current year would be $1,540,200 higher than in 1908.

$25,000,000 FOR CHARITIES

NEW YORKER LEAVES BEQUESTS TO MANY INSTITUTIONS.

Gift Is Largest Single Contribution of Its Kind Ever Made.

New York. — John Stewart Kennedy, one of America's little known rich men, who died of whooping cough in his New York residence on Sunday last, left bequests of more than $25,000,000 to religious, charitable and educational institutions in his will, filed for probate here.

The gift is the largest single contribution of its kind ever made and the beneficiaries include educational and church institutions, north, south, east and west, in the country, and one abroad, 60 in all.

Nearly half of the $25,000,000 goes to institutions connected with the Presbyterian church, of which Mr. Kennedy had been an active member for many years. Other large beneficiaries include the American Bible society, the Metropolitan Museum of Art, the New York public library, the United Charities of New York, Columbia university and Robert college, Constantinople.

Aside from these gifts, Mr. Kennedy left approximately $35,000,000 to his wife, his relatives and a great number of friends and employes. The widow's share will be about $16,000,000. All of the testator's employes received gifts of from $500 to $2,000 each.

The charitable, religious and educational institutions which receive the largest bequests are to share the residue of the estate left after definite gifts of approximately $12,000,000 have been paid out.

PRESIDENT AT BIRMINGHAM

Has Busy Day—Reviews Big Civic Parade—Makes Address in Capital Park.

Birmingham, Ala.—President Taft and party put in a busy day here. At 8:30 o'clock Wednesday the president was driven to the Country club, where breakfast was served, a simple affair with no speechmaking.

About noon began the parade, one of the largest ever seen in Birmingham, composed of commercial, civic and fraternal organizations, school children and 300 automobiles.

After luncheon at the Southern club the president addressed the people in Capital park.

For an hour or more before leaving Jackson the president's special train was parked in the railroad yards immediately alongside one of the sleeping cars of a three-ring circus which played in the Mississippi capital as an opposition attraction to Mr. Taft.

Chicago. — The Chicago police are searching for E. J. Goshorn, a prominent business man of Charleston, W. Va., who disappeared from his home on October 20 with about $30,000 in his possession.

On the day he vanished Goshorn wrote letters to his wife and several confidential acquaintances stating that he had left home never to return. The letters were postmarked at Kansas City, and requested the missing man's wife and friends to write him there as "E. J. West, general delivery."

WILL STORM WHITE HOUSE

Waterway Convention Selects Delegation of 500 to Visit Washington in Interest Deep Channel.

New Orleans.—The lakes-to-the-gulf waterway convention came to an end Tuesday with the selection of President Kavanagh as chairman of the delegation of 500 that will go to Washington December 8 to storm the White House and congress in the interest of the 14-foot channel.

The committee of 500 will endeavor to induce the national assembly to produce funds for the project. But if it does not, then the executive committee of the association is authorized to select the place of meeting of the next convention and fix the day.

The closing session was marked by enthusiastic expressions of faith in an attainment of "14 feet through the valley," further pledges of support of the movement and additional estimates of benefit to result from the movement's realization.

Participating in the program were representatives of several of the Latin-American countries which will be directly affected by the construction of a deepened channel.

Through a set of the most warmly worded resolutions ever adopted by a non-partisan organization the 5,000 delegates to the deep waterway convention, representing every state in the union, pladged themselves to support no candidate for public office hereafter who is not committed in plain language to the policy of immediate action on the lakes-to-the-gulf project.

FATAL DUEL AT THE POLLS

Jackson, Ky. — Predictions made on the streets that "only a man or two" would be killed during the voting in Breathitt county were justified in the Spring Fork precinct, and in a dramatic manner

Here Tilden Blanton, with a left hand shot, instantly killed Demosthenes Noble, after Noble had crippled Blanton's right arm with a bullet. Noble had previously, according to Blanton, placed a pistol at the breast of two of Blanton's brothers. Noble was a member of a powerful feudist family, a former employe of Judge James Hargh, and complications are expected.

Blanton, whose father was a Democratic candidate for county attorney, was acting as challenger, and his story is that Noble was induced to raise a disturbance by discomfited Republicans.

Two shots were fired while Blanton was leaning from the window of the voting place. He was carried into Jackson to the home of his father, and there tacitly arrested. Blanton's father is the famous Breathitt county character who last year on horseback took the ballots to the Crockettsville precinct, when no other man dared make the trip, for fear of an assassin's bullet.

Man Creates Sensation by Confessing That He Is the Real Slayer—He Is Arrested—Faure Scandal Revived.

Paris.—While Mrs. Marguerite Steinheil, in the midst of the agonizing ordeal of her grueling examination, broke out in angry denunciation of Presiding Judge de Valles, the crowded courtroom burst into an uproar and before the municipal guards could grasp the situation the spectactors were rioting.

Extra police were rushed to the scene, but it was many minutes before the violence was quelled.

The outbreak came when Mme. Steinheil, hysterical under the attack of the court, which had finally become a torture, raised her hands and cried out angrily that the attack on her story of the murder of her husband and her stepmother, Mme. Japy, was without warrant.

"I have told the truth! I swear my story is the truth!" she cried in a frenzy of anger at the taunts cast at her by the presiding magistrate, M. de Valles.

A second scene of wild disorder was created when a man, who gave his name as Lefevre, arose from his place in the audience and loudly proclaimed that he, and not Mme. Steinheil, was the slayer of M. Steinheil and Mme. Japy. Mme. Steinheil confronted Lefevre, but said that she was unable to recognize him as one of the murderers whom she had desecribed. Judge de Valles ordered that Lefevre be placed under arrest and an investigation of his statement be made.

Mrs. Steinheil's examination on the charge of murdering her husband and stepmother, Mme. Japy, was concluded in the assize court. She made a wonderful single-handed fight for her life. She displayed as much skill in confounding the judge as she had in baffling the police.

The old scandal which grew out of the fatal illness of Felix Faure, president of France, at the prisoner's home and which a section of the press is anxious to revive, has not yet been mentioned at the trial, although Judge de Valles announced that it was not intended to shield anyone.

SANDBAG EXPRESS CASHIER

Robbers Steal $14,156 from Station While Employes Go Out to Meet Incoming Train.

Niagara Falls.—William Dobson, cashier of the Canadian Express Company here, Thursday was sandbagged in the company's office at the Grand Trunk station and a package containing $14,156 taken from him by two unknown men.

The robbery was committed in broad daylight. Dobson was alone at the time. The two men entered the office and one asked if a trunk had arrived for him.

As Dobson stooped over to get his "on hand" book one of the men reached over the counter and hit him behind the ear with a sandbag or a piece of gas pipe. Five minutes later Dobson was found lying unconscious on the floor in a pool of blood.

All the men working near Cashier Dobson had something to do upon the arrival of a train which called them out on the station platform.

North Dakota Fastest Warship.

Rockland, Me.—The North Dakota is the fastest battleship of the Dreadnought type afloat, as well as one of the two most powerful battleships in the world. Her screw standardization tests over the Rockland measured mile course Thursday developed a maximum speed of 22.25 knots and an average of 21.833. Both marks are in excess of the best performances of either her sister ship, the Delaware, or the Bellerophon, the leader Dreadnought of the British navy. In attaining this surprising speed the turbine engines of the North Dakota were forced to the development of more horse power than has been reached by any battleship afloat.

Arrested for Big Fraud.

Berlin.—Martin Kaufman of New York wac arrested by former United States Post Office Inspector Henry C. Hill on the charge of fraud amounting to $107,000 in connection with the Cotton Goods Convertets' Company of New York. The case has many ramifications. Kaufmann was for a long time considered one of the most worry business men of New York. His partner, M. A. Isaacc, had such implicit confidence in Kaufmann's integrity that, according to Hill, he induced a number of his friends to take shares in the business.

LABOR LEADERS FACE JAIL

COURT DECIDES AGAINST GOMPERS, MITCHELL AND MORRISON.

Officers of the American Federation Lose Appeal in the Buck Stove Contempt Case.

Washington.—The decree of the supreme court of the District of Columbia adjudging the American Federation of Labor leaders, Samuel Gompers, president; John Mitchell, vice-president, and Frank Morrison, secretary, guilty of contempt of court in the Buck Stove case was affirmed by the district court of appeals Tuesday.

Chief Justice Sheppard dissented from the opinion of the court on constitutional grounds.

The effect of the decision will be that Mr. Gompers and the other defendants will have to go to prison.

The fate of the labor leaders was fixed December 23, 1908, when Gompers was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment, Mitchell to nine months, and Morrison to six months.

The case grew out of the alleged boycott of the company's products and the putting of that company's products on the unfair list, and the federation's alleged violation of Judge Gould's recent mandamus has attracted wide attention.

The Bucks company's prosecution of the officials of the federation began in August, 1907. The original action was a test case, wherein it was sought to enjoin the labor unions from using the "unfair" and "we don't patronize" lists in their fight against firms and individuals.

Judge Wright's decision last year, sentencing the three to prison, was a scathing denunciation of the defendants. He recited the conditions anteceding the injunction and referred to the fact that for 25 years the Bucks plant had operated a ten-hour shop and always had maintained an "open shop."

SUICIDE RATE IS GROWING

Figures for 1908 Show Sensational Increase in Self-Destruction Throughout the West.

New York.—Suicide mortality statistics, compiled here, show that the increase in the rate of self-destruction over the increase in population has become so alarming as to attract serious notice throughout the country. There has been a general increase in nearly every city of 65 of the nation's representative municipalities. The increase in Oakland, Cal., was the highest, with 33.6, while the lowest was 0.1, in Buffalo, N. Y.

The increase has been most alarming in the west. With a total of 665 self-inflicted deaths in the tabulated western cities for 1908, the rate has increased 6.1. The rate is 33.8, while it stood only 27.7 for the decade ending 1907. The greatest advance in the rate was shown in Salt Lake City, Utah, with a rate of 39.7 over the figure of 13.3 for the entire previous decade. The increase in all the cities of the Pacific coast was great.

PEARY IS AWARDED MEDAL

National Geographic Society Announces It Accepts Evidence of His Success.

Washington. — Commander Robert E. Peary was voted a gold medal by the National Geographic society for having reached the north pole. The board of managers of the society at a meeting accepted unanimously the report of its subcommittee of scientists, who had examined the explorer's records and proofs, and found them to be corroborative of his statement that he had reached the pole.

The society adopted a resolution that the question of whether or not any explorer reached the north pole prior to 1909 shall be referred to a subcommittee of experts with authority to send for papers or make such journeys as may be necessary to inspect original records. This indicates that the society proposes as soon as possible to pass upon the records of Dr. Frederick A. Cook.

Mistake Somewhere.

A story comes from a Kentucky town that is worth repeating. There lives there a woman who says that she has immediate communion with the Almighty, and now and then delivers to those of common clay a message that she has received from on high. The fact that these messages sometimes take on a very materialistic hue does not alter their effectiveness, in her opinion.

One day she went into the office of a well known attorney and approached him solemnly as one about to reveal an awe-inspiring secret.

"The Lord sent me to you for $25," she announced.

The attorney looked up and smiled.

"That must be a mistake," he replied, blandly, "because the Lord knows I have not got it."

Celestial communication was thereupon broken off.

GO AFTER BUSINESS

TWIN CITY BUSINESS MEN TO SEND MONSTER PETITION TO WASHINGTON.

TO WAKE UP THE INDIAN BUREAU

Present System Slow, Costly and Unfair.—Ballinger to Hear Protest That Northwest Is Now Eliminated.

Minneapolis. — The Minneapolis and St. Paul wholesalers and manufacturers will combine in a monster petition to Secretary Ballinger of the department of the interior, asking that present methods of purchasing supplies for the Indians be modified; that the Indian warehouses maintained at New York, San Francisco, Omaha, St. Louis and Chicago be abolished as soon as possible; that the purchase of supplies be put upon a business basis promotive of greater economy, and that Minneapolis and St. Paul be permitted a share of the business.

Bound by time-honored custom and filled with involved detail and much red tape, the Indian supply bureau will be stirred by the petition. It is headed by men of the highest business standing in the twin cities, and will bear the signatures of a great number interested in the sale of supplies for the reservation and desirous of seeing Minneapolis and St. Paul sharing.

George H. Partridge of Wyman-Partridge & Co., Horace M. Hill of Janney, Semple, Hill & Co., E. J. Stilwell of the Minneapolis Paper Company, and George R. Newell of George R. Newell & Co., met and discussed the petition. In St. Paul, J. H. Beek, secretary of the St. Paul Jobbers' and Manufacturers' Association, took it up. The petition will be a twin city proposition, and is expected to be the strongest presentation of a case ever sent from this section by the big business interests.

Means $1,500,000 Yearly.

Under the annual contract system $1,500,000 worth of merchandise is now furnished the Indian service annually, to be distributed through the northwest, under a system in no wise based upon modern commercial methods. There is a lack of competition, because the conditions imposed upon bidders are so out of line with ordinary business methods that local houses cannot legitimately compete.

It is evident to the jobbing interests that the government supplies are not being obtained at the best price. Goods are now purchased under what is known as the "annual estimate" system. Under this plan a superintendent estimates, from seven to twenty months in advance, the goods that will be required. Frequently more merchandise is bought than is needed.

Abolish Old System.

The plan is to abolish the present system and purchase goods on a merchandise basis, the same as in any other business. If adopted, it would revolutionize the old-time army methods, but the Minneapolis and St. Paul business interests believe they ought to be revolutionized and they are going to be the first people in the United States to bring the matter squarely up to Secretary Ballinger and ask that he reorganize the entire service.

BOLTS STARTS THREE FIRES.

School Building at Triumph Destroyed by November Electric Storm.

Triumph.—During a severe electric storm the Monterey school here was burned. A bolt of lightning ignited the building.

The Western Elevator Company warehouse and the residence and windmill of John Groth were also damaged by fire caused by lightning.

The loss to the school district is $4,000. Temporary quarters will be provided and the school reopened as soon as possible and continued until a substantial building of brick or cement stone can be put up. The insurance carried upon the building amounted to $2,000 and in addition $1,100 was carried on furniture and paraphernalia.

Mrs. Arbogast Acquitted.

St. Paul.—Mrs. Mina Arbogast has been acquitted by a jury in the Ramsey county district court, where she was being tried on the charge of the murder of her husband, Louis Arbogast.

The acquittal came after a trial of more than two weeks, which began before Judge Orr on Oct. 18, and after a long day of argument by County Attorney R. D. O'Brien and Attorney Patrick J. McLaughlin for the defense.

The jury returned the verdict after having been out nearly twenty-four hours.

MANKATO GROCERYMEN FINED.

Dealers Charged With Selling a Jelletin Colored With Coal Tar Dye.

Mankato.—Six or seven local grocerymen were haled into court, charged with selling a jelletin colored with coal tar dye, and each paid a fine of $25 and costs. Deputy State Food Inspector G. J. Robel, who caused the arrests, stated that 80 grocerymen have paid fines this fall for selling the jelletin. The manufacturer, has agreed to stand good for the fines.

DON'T GIVE UP THE FIGHT.

Citizens of Mankato Will Vote Again on Commission Plan.

Mankato.—The charter commission held a meeting and decided to remodel the new charter recently defeated by 28 votes and to submit it again. The changes are not expected to be radical, as the commission voted unanimously to retain the commission feature, which is considered the strong point in the charter. A sub-committee will draft the amendments and report at a meeting to be held later. Last week the commission held an open meeting and listened to suggestions of citizens who were not satisfied with the last new charter. All favored the commission plan with modifications.

The city council Monday night sold $40,000 of waterworks refunding bonds, to mature in twenty years, and to draw 4½ per cent interest. A dozen or more bids were submitted, but the bonds went to Coffin & Crawford, of Chicago, for $41,708.

MINNEAPOLIS TAGS 'EM.

Mill City Raises $19,000 by Popular Method.

Minneapolis.—Tag day receipts here were close to $19,000. This, while short of the $20,000 aimed at by the promoters, is considered by them as satisfactory from many viewpoints.

The amount collected this year is far in excess of that of last year's Tag day, when $14,367.33 was raised to carry on the work of the Visiting Nurses.

Twenty-nine thousand pennies were gathered. Of these 19,400 came from the pupils of the city schools. Sixteen thousand nickels formed another important item on the list, 10,500 silver dollars, $2,400 in paper currency, $40 in gold and $3,478.95 in checks, completed the amount. The largest individual donation was made by a prominent downtown business man, a check for $500.

CORN CARNIVAL FOR LE ROY.

Superintendent A. D. Wilson to Deliver Address to Farmers.

Le Roy.—Charles C. Palmer, a merchant, has arranged to repeat, on Nov. 15, the corn carnival which proved a success last year, and has offered prizes for the best ten ears of white corn and the best ten ears of yellow corn brought in by farmers and raised within fifteen miles of Le Roy. After the prizes have been awarded the visitors will be given a free lunch, and Superintendent A. D. Wilson, of the Minnesota Farmers' Institute, will deliver an address, he also having been selected to judge the entries. The corn carnival is helping to stimulate interest among the farmers in the county.

BURGLARS GET ONLY SMALL SUM

Kenyon.—Burglars visited this city and entered four business houses, but secured less than $15. First the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul depot was entered. The robbers entered the building throw a window and broke the glass in the door to gain admittance to the office. No money was secured. Next the robbers visited the Kenyon Lumber Company's office, where they got only 60 cents. The M. L. Foss saloon was broken inte next and $14 in cash taken. The last raid was made on the John L. Foss saloon. Only 11 cents was taken here. There is no clue to the thieves.

Memorial Services for Cotter.

Winona.—On Nov. 19, the anniversary of the birth of the late Bishop Joseph B. Cotter, memorial services will be held in the chapel of the Winona seminary. A bronze tablet erected in the chapel in memory of the bishop will be unveiled. On All Souls' day this week Rev. Father F. T. English, chaplain at the seminary, celebrated mass for the repose of the soul of the late bishop. The Gregorian chant of the requiem was sung by the seminary choir. In the afternoon the students drove to St. Mary's cemetery, where they recited prayers at the grave of the bishop.

M. & I. Railway Changes.

Brainerd.—Owing to the resignation of W. H. Strachan, superintendent of the Minnesota & International railroad, that office has been abolished and a bulletin issued ordering all employees who reported to him to report to the general manager. The office of trainmaster has been created, and George H. Warner, chief dispatcher, has been promoted to that position. Mr. Strachan has been superintendent seven years, and now goes to Duluth as assistant superintendent of the Northern Pacific.

Dies From Effects of Blow.

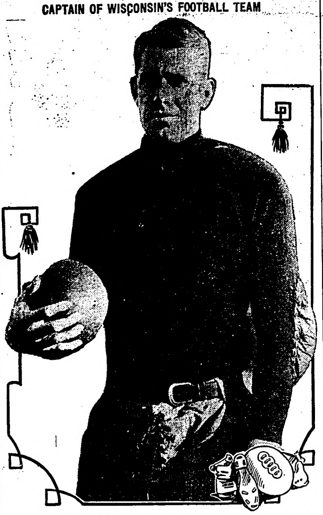
Duluth.—Edward Erickson, proprietor of a saloon, died from the effects of a blow received in a fight in his saloon two weeks ago. He was struck on the head with a cuspidor and Edward Fling, who was arrested for the assault, and was released on bail, has been re-arrested.

SEEKS MISSING SAILOR.

Cleveland (Ohio) Youth Disappears Without Money Due Him.

Duluth.—Joseph Miller, a sailor on the steamer F. W. Hart, disappeared from the vessel at Two Harbors Oct. 24 and his parents in Cleveland are greatly distressed. The young man has money coming to him from the boat, and he took none of his effects when he disappeared. The police of all northern Minnesota towns have been notified.

CAPTAIN OF WISCONSIN'S FOOTBALL TEAM



John Wilce, leader of the Badgers, made one of the most sensational plays seen on the western gridiron this season in the game with Indiana. He saved his team from defeat when he interrupted a forward pass on his own 25-yard line and ran the entire length of the field for a touchdown.

GREAT RACE HORSE DEAD; WILL HAVE A MONUMENT

Salvator, Who Knew Only Three Defeats in Brilliant Career, Succumbs to Old Age.

Salvator, 23-year-old son, by imp. Prince Charlie and Salina, by Lexington, died as a result of paralysis and infirmities of old age at James B. Haggin's Elmendorf farm, near Lexington, Ky. The stable in which Salvator died is within a stone's throw of the spot upon which he was foaled as the property of Daniel Swigert, April 30, 1886.

Haggin ordered that Salvator's feet be mounted and directed that a coffin be prepared for him and a grave dug near Green Hills, in which the famous racer, immortalized in song and story, was buried. Later it is Haggin's intention to erect a granite shaft at the grave.

Salvator, in his three years on the turf, started in nineteen races, won sixteen, was second once, third once, and fourth once. His aggregate winnings were $113,710. He made his first start in the Junior champion at Monmouth park, August 11, 1888. This race was won by Proctor Knott and it was the only one in which Salvator was ever unplaced.

Proctor Knott beat him again by half a length in the Futurity.

The following year he finished third to Longstreet and Proctor Knott in the race for the Omnibus stakes. He won the Flatbush, Maple, Tuckahoe and Titan stakes as a two-year-old and the Tidal, Realization, Lorillard, Jersey handicap, September stakes, and two purses as a three-year-old.

He began his four-year-old form by winning the Suburban handicap, followed by the memorable match for $5,000 a side, in which he beat Tenny a nose over the mile and a quarter route, walked over for the Monmouth cup, beat Tenny four lengths for the Champagne stakes, and closed his career by running a mile on the straight course at Monmouth park in 1:35½, which stands to-day as the American record. In the stud, however, Salvator was not a great success. The best of his get was the Futurity winner, Savable. For the last four or five years he has been a pensioner at Elmendorf.

To Renew the Grand Prix.

Automobile manufacturers in America have for two years contended that racing pays and they have supported their belief to such an extent that from twenty-five to thirty road races a season are contested. It is gratifying to the Americans to have the foreign manufacturers decide that next year will see a renewal of the French Grand Prix, a classic international in character and considered the greatest automobile contest of the world.

Cravath Awarded Back Pay.

The national commission issued a finding in the case of Player C. C. Cravath against the Chicago White Sox. Cravath claimed he had two days' pay coming to him from the Sox and the commission then looked into the matter and had the money paid him—$26.66.

Rossman May Buy Team.

Claude Rossman, formerly of the Detroit Tigers and St. Louis Browns of the American league, may break into the minor leagues, as it is said he is to purchase an interest in the Saginaw Southern Michigan league team and will manage it next year.

JENNINGS SIGNS CONTRACT

Report Says He Will Get $30,000 Provided He Wins Fourth Pennant.

Manager Hugh Jennings of the Detroit American league club signed a contract for the season of 1910. The terms were not disclosed, but it is understood that the manager's demand for an increase in salary was compromised. In the three years Jennings has managed the Tigers he has taken down in salary and profits $41,500—$10,000 in 1907, $14,000 in 1908 and $17,500 this year.

For 1910, it is said, Jennings asked enough to net him $30,000, provided he wins a fourth pennant. Official announcement placed the earnings of the club for the season of 1909 at $166,000, and including the world's series profits about $200,000.

Pitcher George Mullin and Catcher Schmidt have also signed contracts for next season, and Tyrus Cobb signed for three years. Cobb is to get $7,000 a year.

COACH OF THE BADGERS.

Tom Barry, who teaches the Wisconsin university boys how to play football, is a veteran of the game and steadily improved the work of his men as the season advanced.

Rebel Athletes Under Ban.

The determination of President James E. Sullivan of the A. A. U. to exterminate the newly formed athletic body in the middle west, which is antagonistic to the A. A. U., has met with the approval of all clubs affiliated with the A. A. U. Each and every one of these organizations has pledged its support to the head of the A. A. U., and they all have promised to uphold their chief.

Rough Football Game in Texas.

In a game of football at Brownwood, Tex., between Simmons college of Abilene and Howard Payne college of Brownwood, Capt. Airhart of Simmons was carried from the field with a fractured skull. Daniels and Murphy of the same team were seriously hurt.

Hahn Struck Out by Cupid.

Edgar Hahn, right fielder of the Chicago White Sox, was married to Miss Josie Reese, at Nevada, O.

ANOTHER IMPORTANT VICTORY FOR THE CARTER MEDICINE COMPANY IN THE UNITED STATES COURT.

The United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York—sitting in New York City—has just awarded to the Carter Medicine Company a decree which again sustains the company's exclusive right to use the red package for liver pills.

By the terms of the decree, it is, among other things:

Adjudged that the Carter Medicine Company is the owner of the sole and exclusive right to the use of red colored wrappers and labels upon said small, round packages of liver pills of the style described in the bill of complaint; said right having been acquired by the prior adoption of said style and color of package for liver pills by the complainant predecessors more than thirty years ago, and established by the continuous and exclusive use of the same in constantly increasing quantities by said predecessors and by the complainant, the Carter Medicine Company, itself, from the time of their said adoption until the present day.

The decision just announced is perhaps the most important and far-reaching of all, by reason of the character of the tribunal which rendered it. No Court in the country stands higher. —National Druggist, St. Louis, Mo.

She Could Not.

"With one wave of my wand," says the fairy, "I can make you grow young again."

"Excuse me," replied the woman, "if I decline your kind offer. If you can bring youth to me at my present age, all right; but I positively refuse to travel back through pyrography, the first stages of bridge, the habit back, the straight front, balloon sleeves, and all the rest of the fads I can remember."

NEW STRENGTH FOR WOMEN'S BACKS.

How to Make a Bad Back Better.

Women who suffer with backache, bearing down pains, dizzy spells and that constant feeling of dullness and tiredness, will find hope in the advice of Mrs. Mary Hinson of 21 Strother St., Mt. Sterling, Ky. "Had I not used Doan's Kidney Pills, I believe I would not be living today," says Mrs. Hinson. "My eyesight was poor, I suffered with nervous, splitting headaches, spots would dance before my eyes and at times I would be so dizzy I would have to grasp something for support. My back was so weak and painful I could hardly bend over to button my shoes and could not get around without suffering severely. Doan's Kidney Pills helped me from the first, and I continued until practically well again."

Remember the name—Doan's. Sold by all dealers. 50 cents a box. Foster-Milburn Co., Buffalo, N. Y.

Ruled by Kindness.

Lucy Burd's success with boys at the reform school in Bucks county, Pennsylvania, she thinks, is due simply to kindness. She has reformed more than 100 boys in her term of five years as superintendent. Some of her boys are in the navy some on farms. Few have gone back to their old ways after coming under her influence.

These women are only a few of thousands of living witnesses of the power of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to cure female diseases. Not one of these women ever received compensation in any form for the use of their names in this advertisement—but are willing that we should refer to them because of the good they may do other suffering women to prove that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is a reliable and honest medicine, and that the statements made in our advertisements regarding its merit are the truth and nothing but the truth.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Red Lake County Minnesota.

Subscription price $1.00 per year in advance. If not paid in advance $1.50

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam' Minn. under th Act of Congress of March 3, 1879

The monster walking ditching machine that is working near Anton makes a ditch that will drain land, and the sooner we can get a few of them big drains through the eleven townships the sooner we will have roads and the vacant land will be improved and cultivated.

Gully, in northeastern Polk county, will be one of the smartest business towns in northern Minnesota, as soon as the Soo line begin to run their trains through there. They have a fine reller flouring mill that has been there for a number of years and with as fine a farming country tributary to them as there is in northern Minnesota, Gully is going to be lively city.

He Got the Chair.

On a very hot afternoon a number of around town chaps who didn't seem to have much to do were lounging in the chairs in front of a leading hotel. Several traveling men came out of the hotel and, finding all of the chairs occupied, looked and spoke things that wouldn't go well in polite society.

"Let's dump a few of them out," suggested one.

"Hold on a minute," replied another "Watch me get a chair." With that he walked over to one of the loungers and in the most courteous way said "Will you please tell me whether that is a drug store across the street?"

"No," replied the lounger; "that's a bank."

"Oh, is it? Well, say, what is that nice big building just down the street there, two corners away?"

"That's the postoffice," was the reply.

"You live in this charming city, then?" asked the drummer.

"I do," said the lounger.

"Well, then," replied the traveling man, "I'm a guest at this hotel and paying for accommodations. Suppose you get up and give me that chair."

He got the chair.—Kansas City Journal.

Varieties of Humor.

The Temple of Art, devoted to that peculiar form of entertainment yclept "polite vaudeville," was crowded to suffocation as Messrs. Biff and Bang, the refined sketch team and sidewalk conversationalists, stepped jauntily to the footlights. In response to the deafening applause Messrs. Biff and Bang bowed condescendingly, as though it hurt them.

Without further preliminary Mr. Biff hit his partner on the rear of his ample trousers with a stuffed club, remarking, "It's a wise man that knows his own mind."

And Mr. Bang, not to be outdone in this little exchange of pleasantries, promptly buried an ax in the skull of Mr. Biff, remarking the while, "It's a wise man that minds his own nose."

Whereupon the intelligent audience screamed with delight and voted Biff and Bang the best ever. "And yet they were a frost in the London halls," commented a man in the front row. "The English have no appreciation of real humor." — Philadelphia Ledger.

The Smuggled Box.

A joker had some fun with the customs officials at New York some years ago. A servant had gone ashore from a German liner with a basket and was about to leave the pier when a passenger whispered to a customs officer that he had better see what the basket contained. Following the tip, the basket bearer was detained, and a wooden box was found among a lot of soiled linen. The box contained another and this still another box, the third securely fastened with screws. When these were removed a card was discovered on which was written in three languages, "This is the 1st of April. Many happy returns of the day."

A Diplomat.

Possible Client—And is the district at all malarial? My husband asked me to be careful to inquire about that. Agent—Er—what is your husband's business, madam? Possible Client—He is a physician. Agent—Hm-m—well—er—truth compels me to admit, madam, that there has been a good deal of it about here of late years.—Life.

Cautious.

Cook (angrily)—See here, you little imp, did you take that cake off the shelf? Small Boy (son of an attorney)—I decline to answer any questions until I have conferred with my lawyer.—Chicago News.

Who is rich? He who is satisfied with his lot.—Talmud.

POWER OF ONE VOTE.

A Single Ballot Has Often Decided an Important Contest.

In the Continental congress of 1776 Benjamin Harrison defeated John Hancock by one vote for the presiding office. But the Virginian insisted on a new ballot and by his own vote chose Hancock.

In 1784 the illness of one delegate from New Jersey kept slavery out of states admitted to the Union after 1800 and thus confined the civil war contestants to the south Atlantic states.

July 25, 1788, one vote ratified the constitution after the famous debate between Madison and Henry at Richmond. The next day the debate between Hamilton and Clinton ended with New York following suit. In 1790 Rhode Island came in with an equally small margin.

Alexander Hamilton swung one vote to Thomas Jefferson in the electoral college of 1800, thus breaking a deadlock after thirty-six ballots and defeating Aaron Burr. This really began the feud which cost Hamilton his life on the Palisades at Weehawken.

In 1808 Jesse Thomas by his own vote went to congress from the Indiana district. He succeeded in moving the northern boundary of Illinois fifty miles north, thus giving it a lake outlet. Had Illinois been united commercially with the south and her interests tinged with southern ideas the election of Lincoln could never have taken place, and the whole history of the country would have been different.

May 26, 1868, the senate of the United States declared against the impeachment of Andrew Johnson by one vote, 35 to 19, when two-thirds were necessary to decide.—Chicago Journal.

A MISNAMED EXHIBIT.

Brings Joy to the Museum Visitors and Worries the Curator.

A curator at the Metropolitan Museum of Art is threatened with insanity, the cause being a small misnamed exhibit in the gallery outside his office door.

"Twenty times a day," declared the harassed man, "people discover that that china statuette out in the Franklin collection is named General Washington instead of Benjamin Franklin. Then they burst in here and announce their discovery and wonder that no one ever noticed it before. Half my time is spent in explaining that we know it well, that it was simply a mistake of the potter who labeled it in France over a century ago and that we cannot change it nor wouldn't if we could.

"Of course I tell them this courteously and patiently, and you know what a strain that is when you are going over the same thing for the thousandth time! I'd latch the door, only there are too many candidates seeking me all day long, so here I must sit and listen to the names of George Washington and Benjamin Franklin repeated a million times till I wish that neither of those glorious patriots had ever lived. And it's driving me insane, I tell you; it's driving me insane!"

Just then the door opened and a lady popped in with:

"There's a statue out here named General Washington, but I'm sure"—

And the weary curator, being a southerner, rose smilingly to his task.—New York Times.

A Telegram That Talked.

At one time when Georgie Drew Barrymore was playing in San Francisco a fabulous sum was offered her by a local theater for her services for a few weeks. The offer was exceedingly tempting, but her contract with Charles Frohman stood in the way However, on the nothing-venture-nothing-won theory, she telegraphed a detailed statement of the offer she had received to Frohman in New York, explained how anxious she was to accept it and wound up with the plea "Will you release me?" In due course of time she received the following telegram in answer:

Mrs. Georgie Drew Barrymore, Palace Hotel, San Francisco:
No! CHARLES FROHMAN.

Albeit disappointed, Mrs. Barrymore at once sent this characteristic reply:

Charles Frohman, New York City:
Oh!
GEORGIE DREW BARRYMORE.

Doing Double Duty.

"It was one of those sleepy, one horse, back water towns, like Squash," said a congressman, describing at a Hot Springs dinner a town that he disliked.

"Squash is the limit. A gentleman arrived there the other day and wanted a hair cut. He found the barber shop and, after shaking the barber vigorously, managed to awaken him.

"'How long will it take you to cut my hair, barber?' he asked.

"'Not long, boss,' said the barber.

"And he rose, yawned and stretched himself. Then he called upstairs to his wife:

"'Hey, send the kid down to the newspaper office to tell the editor I want my scissors just as soon as he's done editin' the paper. There's a gent here waitin' for a hair cut.'"—Washington Star

Pet Boars.

The nicest pet the French forest affords is the marcassin, or baby wild boar. It is almost human in its cleverness, delights in funny pranks, has an evident sense of humor, makes friends of children and dogs and even lends itself to mimic hunts, playing the part of the hunted animal. Its antics are varied and original. The only creature to which the marcassin objects is its distant relative, the pig. Directly it sees that animal its back is up and its growing tusk is bared. In babyhood it has a lovely sleek coat of very dark brown and tan. When the silky hair is shed and bristles take its place the temper grows uneven. If marital and paternal cares come on, the wild boar puts away its childish ways and wants to take its family to the forest to feed there on acorns and beech mast. Woe to the hound or to the keeper who wants to keep him back. In the forest this paterfamilias may be called the first line of defense, the sow the second and the little ones gambol round her.—Paris Cor. London Truth

Naming a Kansas River.

Practically all the streams in Kansas were named by Indians and carry those names to this day, though in an Anglicized form.

The Neosho, the largest stream in southeast Kansas, has its own little story. The Osage Indians at one time lived in Missouri, and when they began talking of trading their lands in that state and moving to southern Kansas a party was sent out to look the country over and make a report on it. It was in the summer time and very hot and dry. Coming over the prairie northeast of Humboldt, they had a long way to travel without water.

"When they arrived at the river," said an Oswego man, "an Indian rode down the sloping bank into the water. But, to his surprise, the horse stepped right off into deep water, and the horse and Indian went in all over. As the aborigine clambered back on the bank he muttered, 'Wugh Neosho.' This in plain English means water pocket, or water hole, and the name clung to the stream ever afterward."—Hutchinson News.

Living the Simple Life.

A number of men gathered in the smoking car of a train from Little Rock to another point in Arkansas were talking of the food best calculated to sustain health.

One Arkansan, a stout, florid man, with short gray hair and a self satisfied air, was holding forth in great style.

"Look at me," he exclaimed—"never a day's sickness in my life, and all due to simple food! Why, gents, from the time I was twenty to when I reached forty years I lived a regular life. None of these effeminate delicacies for me, no late hours! Every day, summer and winter, I went to bed at 9; got up at 5; lived principally on corned beef and corn bread; worked hard, gents, worked hard, from 8 to 1; then dinner, plain dinner, then an hour's exercise and then"—

"Excuse me, Bill," interrupted a stranger who had up to this refrained from entering the discussion, "but what was you in for?"—Minneapolis Journal.

Very Nicely English.

This curious Bengali English was used to advertise a circus in India: "Some horse will make very good tricks. The klown will come and talk with that horses therefore audience will laugh itself very much. The lady will walk on horses back and horse is jumping very much also. The klown will make a joking words and lady will become to angry therefore klown will run himself away. One man will make so tricks of trapeze audience will fraid himself very much. One lady will make himself so bend, then everybody he will think, he is the rubber lady. This is the very grand display. This is the very better gymnastics. One man will walk on wire tight, he is doing very nicely because he is professor of that."

Building Up a Speech.

Before making a speech Charles Dickens would decide on his various heads and then in his mind's eye liken the whole subject to the tire of a cart wheel, he being the hub. From the hub to the tire he would run as many spokes as there were subjects to be treated, and during the progress of the speech he would deal with each spoke separately, elaborating them as he went round the wheel, and when all the spokes dropped out one by one and nothing but the tire and space remained he would know that he had accomplished his task and that his speech was at an end.

Doing It.

Running Conversation.

Collector (angrily)—You know very well, sir, that this bill has been running several years. Now, I put it up to you, what do you want me to do with it? Debtor—By George, I'd enter it in the next Marathon race if I were you!—Puck.

What Did He Mean?

"Yes; I believe that every intelligent woman should have a vote."

"But, senator, I understand that you were opposed to women's suffrage?"

"I am."—Judge.

THE LOCAL NEWS.

Do your Notary Public business at the SUNBEAM office.

Make your applications to make final proof and for farm loans at this office.

The weather is still fair today, but it is very uncertain how long it will continue.

Miss Henry, of Kratka commenced teaching school in the Swanson district Monday.

We had a slight flurry of snow last night which will make it bad for the deer.

Our Kratka local writer did not show up this week. We guess he had something else to do.

Ye editor made a hurry-up trip to Thief River Falls and Crookston Saturday, returning Monday,

Those who were down at Red Lake Falls on citizenship paper business last Monday; say that city was full of courting people.

C.W. Joonson, of Rhoda made two trips with mail carrier C. L. Clark this week, to open gates for him, while breaking in a new horse.

Another effort will be made to fix a crossing across the beaver dam on the Sund farm next Monday. Aall turn out and let us try to get this bad place fixed up before the freeze up comes.

All kinds of tame strawberry plants for sale, by John Wjientek, the Hilda Nurseryman. Now is a good time of year to fix up a nice strwberry bed for next season.

The Ole Giving threshing machine broke down last week, and delayed threshing some, but with fair luck and weather they expect to finish next week,

Our school seems to be in a very healthy condition this fall, and the enrollment will reach about 80, when we get them all gathered in. We are not haveing a first grade school this year, but were fortunate in securing the service of an experienced teacher.

OPEN THAT MAIL ROAD.

It is gating to be almost impossiable for a mail carrier to travel from here to Radney, and from there to Rhoda. The people liveing along the road take no interest in trying to fix up any of the bad places, but if there is a peice of passiable road on the section line the peo that are farming the land beside it will hawl the stones off their their fields and dump them right in the center of the road, then they place gates and bars across the road in places where the roads leave the section line for a mail carrier to open and close, and while he is shuting the gate his team will run away. Then they will meet him at Radney and say: "You had better turn for it is impossiable for you to get through." This has been going on about long enough, and if there is a class of people live down in that locality that do not want government mail service, there is other people liveing on this route that do, and if it is your purpose to continue to obstruct that mail carrier getting through your locality, the matter will be promptly taken up with the post office department and you are likely to have an opprotunity to carry your own mail, open and shut your own gates, climb over the stones, you have placed in the road to suit yourselves, but you are not going to stop the mail on this mail rout, for if you don't want mail, other people do, and this route is to long to be obstucted by a few people liveing on one part of it and your advice, to turn around will not be taken by the mail carrier, for that mail will go throug, if you have to be side tracted to let it pass. It's up to you! Will you stop blocking that mail road or not?

The Touaregs, to Whom Timbuktu Owes Its Origin.

A recent explorer, journeying from Tripoli across the great desert of Sahara, gives account of much opposition to his progress offered by the various wandering tribes. Much of the most serious trouble was caused by the Touaregs, a strange band of people, supposed by some to have descended from the crusaders. These dwellers of the desert are distinguished by the wearing of veils, a custom which has caused much discussion. Says Felix Dubois in "Timbuktu the Mysterious:"

As you travel an atmosphere of secrecy hovers over the country, and you remember that these mysterious Touaregs are still momentarily its oppressors and masters.

These people keep their eyes from the excessive glow of the desert by two veils, one rolled round the temples and falling down in front, the other reaching from the nostrils to the edge of the clothing, covering the lower part of the face. Savants seek all manner of farfetched origins to explain this custom. Hygiene is obviously the only motive. This is proved by their own statements and by the sobriquet "mouths for flies," which they give to all who do not wear the veils.

These veils are never removed, even at mealtimes. They are so much a part of their wearers that any one deprived of such covering is unrecognized by his friends and relatives. If a number of the tribe should be killed in battle, no one could identify them if they had not on their veils.

Theft is the Touareg's natural form of industry. "This word," says a native proverb, "is like water fallen upon sand, never to be found again." The Sudanese term them as "thieves, hyenas and abandoned of God." Yet to this strange tribe Timbuktu owes its origin.

The Force of Habit.

One of the campers had done something peculiarly idiotic, and the dean said, "Dick reminds me of Thomas' colt."

"What about Thomas' colt?" asked Dick cheerfully.

"Why," the dean responded readily, "where I lived in Maine when I was a boy an old man named Thomas raised horses. He once put out to pasture a colt which had been fed from its birth in a box stall and watered at the trough in the yard.

"The pasture lay across a small river, and in the middle of the day the colt swam the stream to go up to the barnyard for a drink of water."

English as Spoken in London.

I must confess in passing that after a lifetime spent upon English I had nearly as much difficulty with that language "as she is spoke" upon the streets of London by the common people as I had with French and German in Paris and Berlin. The most popular sensational journal of London is the Daily Mail. They call it the Dily Mile. Many other words are equally unrecognizable.—London Letter to Springfield (Mass.) Republican.

First Use of Iron.

As a result of his interesting investigations, Dr. Ridgeway concludes that the smelting of iron originated in central Europe, and especially in the region known as Noricum, equivalent to modern Austria and Bavaria.

In Egypt it can be traced back to the ninth century B. C., and in Libya to about 450 B. C. First mention of its use in China goes back to 400 B. C., while in Uganda it is said to have been in use only some five or six centuries.

The above date for the first use of iron in Egypt refers to the metal obtained by smelting. The use of native iron in the form of meteorites dates back to remote antiquity. The weapons made from these were obtained, like flint implements, by chipping. And it is interesting to remember that recent investigations have shown that the iron of many meteorites is a sort of natural steel.

Old English Fine.

In the past if one Englishman called another a liar there was something to pay. The seventeenth century mayor, sheriff and city grandees generally were keen on this point of etiquette. The direct accusation cost 11s. 6d. ($2.76); the subtle hint 6s. 8d. ($1.60). And there was a reduction on repetitions.

Swearing, too, was promptly suppressed. In 1650 a law was passed laying down the penalty for a first offense. The fines were graduated. That for a lord was 30 shillings ($7.20), for an esquire 10 shillings ($2.40), while all "inferior persons" could have a "few words" for 3s. 4d. (80 cents).

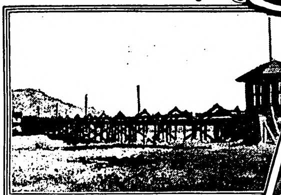
MEETINGS of AMERICAN PRESIDENTS

THAT the United States and Mexico are daily practicing the lessons of peace is shown in the thousands of miles of practically unguarded border which half a century ago demanded thousands of troops for protection. If any additional guarantee was needed it was shown in the recent exchange of visits between President Taft of the United States and President Diaz of Mexico. It required a special concession from the Mexican congress in order that the illustrious Mexican might cross the border to grasp the hand of the man who has been honored with the highest office of the United States. President Taft set aside precedent and crossed over into Mexico to return the visit and the many pleasing incidents connected with his brief sojourn on foreign soil emphasized the friendly relations that exist between the two countries.

There have been meetings in the past between presidents of American republics which were fraught with much of historic significance to the people they represented. Great affairs of state have been discussed in this manner with consequences of great benefit to the countries involved.

In the year 1822 the port of Guayaquil, Ecuador, was the scene of one of the most notable events in the history of America. Bolivar, the liberator of the northern provinces, and San Martin, the liberator of the southern provinces, met together for a conference that decided the destiny of South America. Bolivar was certain that his genius would be rewarded by the honor of the election to the first presidency of the country to which he had given freedom. San Martin, had he but asked it, could have become the elected head of a new nation. San Martin withdrew, however. The war against Spain had still months to run before a constitution could be made effective and therefore this hoped-for first meeting of presidents was only a dream that might have been.



THE INTERNATIONAL BRIDGE OVER THE RIO GRANDE

History shows that the struggle for liberty continued for a generation beyond the elections of the first presidents in many of the republics of America. Early meetings may have taken place between some of them for the purpose of informal discussion concerning unsettled policies of constitution and government, but there are scant evidences of any such personal communication. One meeting, however, is recorded, which was fruitful of results that influenced the future development of the whole region of the river Plate. This occurred in the year 1865. At that time the war in Paraguay had reached a crisis. The Argentine Republic, Uruguay and Brazil had decided to combine forces against President Lopez of Paraguay, but at the moment harmony of action had been lacking because of indefiniteness of purpose among the three republics. It was then that President Flores of Uruguay crossed to Buenos Aires to confer with President Bartolome Mitre of the Argentine Republic. He was received in state, but the council was one for military deliberation rather than for official and diplomatic ceremony. The Brazilian minister was called to this meeting and there three agreed upon an offensive and defensive alliance, the consequences of which are seen in the national boundaries of to-day.

In disturbances of this nature a president was apt to be not only the constitutional but also the actual commander-in-chief of the army of his country. Experience on the field was an essential factor for success in the executive chair. A far-off reflection of the glories of Crecy might have been the ambition of many of these leaders, if the strong love for constitutional republicanism had not held them and the people in check.

Meetings of American presidents, therefore, have in the great majority of cases taken place as a matter of neighborliness and to strengthen the ties of friendship which must, as time passes, draw closer to each other the republics of the new world. Their purpose has been altogether one of peace. A notable instance of such a conference is shown by the meeting held at Corinto, on August 21, 1904, when the presidents of Nicaragua, Honduras and Salvador and a special delegate from the president of Guatemala assembled with the express intention of fostering by all honorable means the peace of Central America. The four governments thus represented manifested a decided moral resolve to harmonize the ambitions of each for the good of all. Steps like this lead to beneficial consequences and undoubtedly the sympathetic expression of regard between these neighbors made easier the brilliant peace conference held by the five republics of Central America under Secretary Root's guidance in the closing months of 1907.

Central America probably leads in the number of cases when presidents have grasped one another by the hand and discussed among themselves, by oral communication, affairs and policies they were elected to guard. It is not a long journey from one capital to another, and between contiguous seaports the distance is so short that informal meetings are easy of accomplishment. The president of Salvador and the president of Guatemala have more than once exchanged personal greetings. In fact, Gen. Rufino Barrios, while chief executive of Guatemala, was an attentive host, for the presidents of Costa Rica and of Honduras, during two administrations, visited him. The presidents of Costa Rica and of Nicaragua once met on the frontiers of the republics, and so rapidly are the means of communication being extended in this century that undoubtedly many similar meetings will be arranged in the future for the benefit of this Central American confraternity.

With the growing demand for mutual understanding and the absence of all that danger which has so frequently attended the visits of European rulers outside the confines of their own nations, these international visits are becoming more and more frequent. Sometimes they are of an informal nature, the president traveling in his private capacity and being welcomed as a foreign guest simply. Some years ago President Zaldivar of Salvador came to the United States and was received as befitted his position. President Iglesias of Costa Rica, just before his brother entered the Naval academy at Annapolis, traveled incognito through the United States and was entertained by President McKinley in Washington. He has always looked back upon that event with a kindly memory. Many years before that, however, Gen. Rufino Barrios, while president of Guatemala, visited the United States, and so cordial was his reception here that his government made this event the subject of a special communication to the government of the United States.

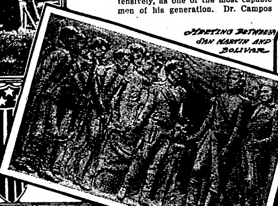
A former president of the United States was also a traveler into a foreign land, although it was at the time a favorite subject of argument whether he stepped on foreign soil. In November, 1906, President Roosevelt made his trip of inspection to Panama. He was formally received by President Amador, by officials of the government, and informally he met the president of Panama on several occasions subsequently.

What might be called a return visit of presidents was made shortly after this by President Amador of Panama, who came to the United States in November, 1907. He was not in good health, however, and could not receive the attention which would otherwise have been given him. Whatever meeting took place between him and President Roosevelt was of the simplest possible nature.

These occasions have not lacked in ceremony, although in most cases it has been the individual traveling in a quasi private capacity rather than the representative of a nation who was the recipient of the honors bestowed by a nation upon a distinguished guest. Although the personality of a president has always been a factor in his reception, the ceremony has been doubly impressive when he has been formally and by premeditation invited to visit a foreign country and a different people from his own. Such visits have been rare, even in America, and when they occur are of more than passing interest. Especially in Latin America, too, where the people take delight in ceremony and where their artistic instinct appreciates the value of the event, an occasion of this kind becomes a wonderful agent in increasing friendship and mutual understanding.

It is pleasant, therefore, to record two brilliant instances of the meeting of two great presidents of American republics, arranged as an affair of state and carried out with all the pageantry for which the scenes were so well fitted. Reference is made to the visit paid to the president of Brazil by the president of the Argentine Republic in August, 1899, and to the return visit paid to the president of the Argentine Republic by the president of Brazil in October, 1900.

Gen. Julio A. Roca was in his second term as president of the Argentine Republic. He had served his country long and faithfully in many positions of trust and was recognized in Europe, where he had traveled extensively, as one of the most capable men of his generation. Dr. Campos Salles had assumed the presidency of Brazil in 1898. His early life had been passed under the empire, but the spirit of the age had fired his republicanism, and, despite all the traditions of an hereditary aristocracy, he had devoted his genius and his energy to the establishment and perpetuation of the new republic.



MEETING BETWEEN SAN MARTIN AND BOLIVAR

MEETING BETWEEN PRESIDENTS OF ARGENTINA AND CHILE.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT REPLYING TO PRESIDENT AMADOR'S WELCOME IN PANAMA.

The Argentine Republic and Brazil have long been on friendly footing, but, separated as their capitals are by 1,000 miles of ocean, or by an equal number of miles of almost untraveled forest, they have not always been able to find opportunity to meet in intimate friendship. For this reason, and because the times seemed favorable for expressions of personal and national regard, these visits were arranged between the two nations. It was the first time in the history of South America that an official visit was paid by one president of a republic to another. A squadron of the navy escorted President Roca to Rio Janeiro, where the Brazilians were lavish in their hospitality. The city was en fete for days, and the enthusiasm of the people was the best evidence of the success of the hitherto untried event. The Argentine Republic, not to be outdone in a display of hospitality and friendship, made even more elaborate preparations for the return visit of President Campos Salles the following year. Buenos Aires was decorated in all the perfection of which that beautiful city is capable. The people demonstrated that their friendship and hospitality was as sincere and spontaneous as that of their neighbors, and the impressions of good will left on each other, however much it may be founded on sentiment, have undoubtedly carried far-reaching consequences in the hearts of the citizens of these two republics.

Visits of courtesy of an informal nature are becoming more and more frequent as good-fellowship spreads from nation to nation. An instance well in point is seen in the proposed call at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, of President Montt of Chile, who will pay his respects to the president of Brazil when he returns from Europe early in the coming year.

Meetings on the boundary between nations are of a somewhat different character and cannot, from the very nature of the locality, be surrounded with the elaborateness of ceremony attainable in a nation's capital. They have a world-wide significance, however, since they show that presidents can shake hands across the border and that what they like to do in brotherly affection the neighboring people will do also. Another good result of such a meeting is the direct benefit upon the people of the region through which a president travels, for it brings him into touch with many persons and conditions he might not see otherwise, and carries evidence to all alike that he is their executive official as well as that of the residents of the capital of the nation.

Consequences of great benefit, for instance, followed the meeting, in 1899, between President Roca of the Argentine Republic and President Errazuriz of Chile, in the Strait of Magellan. They discussed practical affairs, the administration of their respective offices and the mutual relation of their governments to the people's welfare, but more than that the visit furnished an object lesson to each president of the needs and requirements of the growing territory through which he had to pass.

The inhabitants of the south and southwestern United States never cease to be grateful for the presidential visit paid to them in 1901. New Orleans, although once the capital of a vast territory acquired by a president of the United States 100 years before, had never seen a head of the nation until President McKinley came. This trip was continued, with equally lasting benefits, through Texas, New Mexico, Arizona and California. It was in El Paso, Texas, that a meeting had been arranged between President McKinley and President Diaz of Mexico, but the poor health of the latter prevented him from making such a long journey away from his home, and in his stead he delegated several high officials of the Mexican government to meet and greet President McKinley on the international bridge across the Rio Grande connecting the two republics.

MR. PLAZAZUS' RECORD

One of the Reasons Why He Couldn't Get Extension of Credit.

"We're pretty nearly sting proof," said a banker the other day. "Any time any one puts one over on us he'll have to operate with a mace. Nowadays no bit of information about a client's personal character is considered too pennyroyal for us to notice it."

The statement was called out by the presence on the banker's desk of a large roll of manuscript reports, pinned together. The unfortunate who had been made a subject of an antemortem had always thought himself a pretty fair sort of a citizen. He hadn't done anything very objectionable, beyond getting stewed now and then, riding a bit too fast in autos and acting as a chronic host for Broadway's chorus girls, the New York correspondent of the Cincinnati Times-Star says. It so happened that he wanted an extension of credit and had applied to his bank for it. And the credit man did the rest.

"We have here," said the banker, "the usual Dun and Bradstreet reports on Mr. Plazazus. We have a highly entertaining series of clippings, in which our late client appears as the leading man in a lot of funny doings by electric light. We also have statements from every man he has ever worked for and so far as possible every man he has ever done business with. And still we haven't enough. I have asked for a special report upon certain phases of his activity that are not shown here. Every bank in New York has been victimized at various times by men who offer us an apparently clean bill of health. We don't find out until it is everlastingly too late that they are sufferers from a moral pip. Nowadays a man to get credit standing at a New York bank must pass an examination that would send the average deacon howling to the woods."

In Mr. Plazazus' case his request for a loan was refused and he was asked to take his account out. Not that it wasn't sound financially, but two years ago he had been jobbed by a bunch of shell workers. "A man," said the bank president, "who tries to get money in that way expects to profit by a dishonest game. He's apt to try to hand us a queer check next time he gets hard up. That experience of his proves him to be not merely a fool, but a dishonest fool. We can't afford to waste time on either class.'

Attaining Friends.

The Remarkable Trimming.

"Jimmy," said the pretty actress to her actor husband, "won't you run down to the milliner's and get me the hat I ordered?"

"Sure I won't make a mistake?" queried Jimmy, somewhat dubiously, with a caution born of an utter ignorance of millinery.

"Oh, you won't," laughed the spouse. "My hat is the white beaver trimmed with orchids. You can remember that."

Gamely he went to his doom. Entering the millinery shop, he asked, valiantly: Is my wife's hat ready? I mean the white biffer, trimmed with oh-you-kids?"

And the French girls in the shop made funny Parisian giggles at him.

SOME HARD KNOCKS

Woman Gets Rid of "Coffee Heart."

The injurious action of Coffee on the heart of many persons is well known by physicians to be caused by caffeine. This is the drug found by chemists in coffee and tea.

A woman suffered a long time with severe heart trouble and finally her doctor told her she must give up coffee, as that was the principal cause of the trouble. She writes:

"My heart was so weak it could not do its work properly. My husband would sometimes have to carry me from the table, and it would seem that I would never breathe again.

"The doctor told me that coffee was causing the weakness of my heart. He said I must stop it, but it seemed I could not give it up until I was down in bed with nervous prostration.

"For eleven weeks I lay there and suffered. Finally Husband brought home some Postum and I quit coffee and started new and right. Slowly I got well. Now I do not have any headaches, nor those spells with weak heart. We know it is Postum that helped me. The Dr. said the other day, 'I never thought you would be what you are.' I used to weigh 92 pounds and now I weigh 158.

"Postum has done much for me and I would not go back to coffee again for any money, for I believe it would kill me if I kept at it. Postum must be well boiled according to directions on pkg., then it has a rich flavour and with cream is fine."

Administering Justice

By H. R. SIDDON

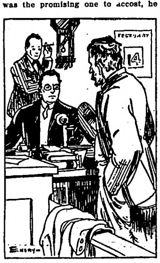
(Copyright, by W. G. Chapman.)

It was a raw, bleak morning in the late autumn, but Mr. Owens, the western manager of the New Haven Malleable Company, scorned the comfort of a closed car. "Fresh air" was a hobby of his, and pedestrianism was another. He imposed the walk between his home and office, a distance of some two miles, upon himself daily. His bookkeeper, a slender, pale-faced youth, was just in the act of referring to the thermometer as Mr. Owens entered the office.

"What? Cold as usual, Wilkey? Not steam enough on?" laughed the manager, shedding his overcoat and throwing it carelessly over the railing in front of his desk. "Wilkey, tell you what it is—if you'd walk down of a morning, you'd get up some steam of your own."

Mr. Owens was a man past the prime of life. His accent marked him as a "down easterner," but his manner led one to believe he had lived long in the west. He was tall, broad shouldered, simple, energetic, whole souled, and, above all, sympathetic. He treated the members of his office force with cordial familiarity. He usually addressed Charley, the office boy, as "my son."

He had only just begun to attack the batch of letters on his desk when the office door opened and admitted a gaunt, shabby individual, who looked furtively around the room and quickly satisfied himself that Mr. Owens was the promising one to accost, he shambled, hat in hand, to the manager's desk.



He Shambled, Hat in Hand, to the Manager's Desk.

Mr. Owens looked over his glasses any met the stranger's deprecatory eyes.

"I'm sorry to trouble ye, sir," the man began.

"But you're hungry, and can't get work;" Mr. Owens finished, promptly. He studied the unshaven face of the mendicant a moment, then went on: "Well, my man, I've been in the same boat myself and I know how sea-sick it makes a fellow feel. Here you are," and a quarter dropped into the grimy, outstretched hand.

"That's all right. Cut all that out," Mr. Owen interrupted, motioning the man off, and before the beggar was half through with his speech of gratitude his benefactor was deep in another letter. The door had been closed on the vagrant but a moment, however, when Mr. Owen raised his eyes and was vaguely conscious that something which he had seen but a moment before was missing. Suddenly he sprang from his chair, seized his hat, and rushed precipitately from the office.

"Couldn't get work, eh? Well, I'll teach the hobo!" he muttered to himself, but Wilkey's hearing was acute.

Mr. Owens looked up and down the thoroughfare and soon singled out his man in the moving throng, and the pursuit began. Down the street the philanthropist sped like a hound that has caught the scent.

A driver on a coal wagon stood up and tried, from his elevated position, to pick the man who was hunted. With one accord men, women and children stepped out of Owens' path and stopped at the side of the walk to follow him with their eyes. At the corner he collided with a young man who was so daintily choosing his steps across a damp place in the walk that he failed to observe the runner.

"Beg pardon!" exclaimed Mr. Owens, as he threw his arm round the fellow long enough to steady him.

"I'm surprised you've the grace to apologize," answered the indignant dandy. "Pardon, indeed!"

Mr. Owens stopped an instant to shout over his shoulder: "Pardon was what I said, sir; but I'll be back in a minute if you care to wait for me;" then he rushed on.

"Say, mister, there's not a cop in sight. You'll have time to get your wind," jeered a newsboy.

The distance was not great, and at last Owens was abreast of the man he was after. The tramp hardly recognized the benevolent gentleman of a few minutes before in the irate, fierce, determined man who now blocked his way.

Before the fellow could defend himself, Owens collared him, swung him off his feet and began literally cleaning off the sidewalk with him.

"You're a nice specimen, you are," Owens grunted between each shake of the terrorized and gasping victim. "You're a good thing to be turned loose on a charitable public. You thought you could get the best of Billy Owens, did you? Umph! I'll show you what kind of trees make shingles!"

In an instant they were the center of a curious crowd, and by the time Mr. Owens had worked off a little of his anger, the circle was divided to admit an officer of the law.

"Hello, there! I thought you'd get around before long," Mr. Owens remarked.

"What's the row about?" asked the policeman, laying a detaining hand upon the poor wretch as Owens loosed his hold.

"An overcoat," Owens explained. "It's a chilly morning, and I don't blame anyone for wanting one, but what I object to is being left without one myself. And having it disappear, too, with a Weary Waggles I'd just given money for his breakfast. That was adding insult to injury. Maybe he thought I was easy, but I reckon he's found out his mistake."

"Where is the coat?" asked the officer.

Mr. Owens looked the prisoner over from head to feet and a curious expression dawned on his face.

"I'll be hornswaddled if the fellow hasn't got it on!" he ejaculated, slowly.

The explanation was greeted by an explosion of laughter from the bystanders, in which Owens himself and the officer joined, and even the culprit's face looked less solemn for a moment, for the garment in question now looked much more in keeping with the thief's costume than Mr. Owen's.

"Next time I turn street cleaner I'll take care that it isn't with my overcoat," he added, when the laugh had subsided.

After proving that the coat was unquestionably his by his knowledge of the pockets' contents, Mr. Owens furnished the policeman with his name and address and was allowed to depart with his recovered property over his arm.

He looked sheepish as he once more seated himself at his desk. Presently he called Charley and said: "Say, my son, if you happen to have an errand near Dolan's any time this morning, I wish you'd take this remnant of a coat over with you and see if he can fix it up for me. And if you don't mind a bit of advice from an old sinner, just learn to keep your temper while you're young, for," he added, with a laugh, "you'll never learn when you're old.

"Yes, sir," Charley answered, with a grin that threatened to become a laugh. He had been an eye-witness to Mr. Owen's administration of justice, and had sped back to the office and reported the occurrence before that gentleman's arrival.

The grin aroused Mr. Owens' suspicions. He glanced hurriedly around, only to see half suppressed smiles on all the faces.

"Boys," he laughed, "I guess I'll have to own that this fracas is one on me."

And he passed round the cigars.

An hour later he again addressed the bookkeeper.

"Wilkey, do you suppose there is anything I could do for the poor devil? I hope the law won't be too hard on him."

Penn's Burial Place.

For some time past there has been a movement in the United States for obtaining the permission of the English government to transfer the remains of William Penn from the little burial ground at Jordans, Chalfont St. Peter, Buckinghamshire, to America, but the Middlesex and Buckingham Advertiser is in a position to state that any fears as to the accomplishment of that object are premature, and that there is little likelihood of the Society of Friends agreeing to any such proposal. But the request has been made, and will doubtless be made again, so that it behooves all lovers of this notable shrine to be watchful.

Mr. Edward Marsh of Luton, who is one of the Friends closely associated with the maintenance of Jordans, informed our contemporary that there were certain negotiations pending in 1881 between a commissioner appointed by the commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the trustees of Jordans Meeting House and Burial Ground with reference to the proposal to remove the bones of William Penn to Philadelphia. These negotiations came to an end, and they have never been resumed, the sentiment of the official custodians of Jordans being now, if possible more completely opposed to any disturbance of human remains than it was 28 years ago.—Westminster Gazette.

British Inn Name.

The inn known as the "Same Yet" at Prestwich, England, has a curious history, which Mr. Hackwood relates: "The house originally bore the 'Seven Stars,' but many years ago it became necessary to have its faded sign repainted. When the painter asked the landlord what he was to put on the board he received the answer, 'The same yet.' And the man took him at his word."

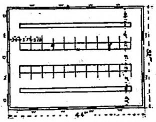
STABLE FOR STALL FEEDING

Detailed Plan and Illustration of Building Suitable for Caring for Twenty Head.

A description and plan of a stable suited for the care of 20 head of cattle, with a feed passage running down the center, is given below:

In order to gain room overhead, the side wall should be 16 feet high and have a nice gambrel roof over all. Such a building will hold fodder for 20 head during winter. Make the stable ceiling eight feet high and put in every window as shown W on plan; doors, D.

Put in two air shafts, 20 in. square, leading up to peak of roof and discharging into cupolas, with louvre bars to cause draft. Fit with adjustable slides at bottom. To provide fresh air, have windows working freely and as your winter is not very prolonged or severe, I think this will work nicely. To construct the building will require the following: Two side sills, 8x8 in. x 24 ft.; 2 side sills, 8x8 in. x 22 ft.; 2 end sills, 8x8 in. x 32 ft.; 8 posts, 8x8 in. x 16 ft.; 3 posts, 8x8 in. x 9 ft.; 2 plates, 8x8 in x 9 ft.; 6 purlin girts, 5x5 in. x 5 ft.; 2 gable girts, 5x5 in. x 11 ft.; 2 end girts, 5x5 in. x 12 ft.; 2 end girts, 5x5 in. x 16 ft.; 18 side girts, 5x5 in. x 15 ft.; 2 plates 8x8 in. x 22 ft.; 8 purlin posts, 7x7 in. x 18 ft.; 2 purlin plates, 7x7 in. x 25 ft.; 2 purlin plates, 7x7 in. x 22 ft.; 4 main beams, 8x9 in. x 32 ft.; 4 purlin beams, 7x7 in. x 20 ft.; 42 joists, 3x8 in. x 12 ft.; 21 joists, 3x8 in. x 10 ft.; 32 lower rafters, 2x5 in. x 13 ft.; 32 upper rafters, 2x2 in x 13 ft.; 18 pieces, 3x4 in. x 10 ft. for braces; 5,272 sq. ft. matched siding; 2,392 sq. ft. roofing 1-in. boards; 1,700 sq. ft. loft flooring, 7-8 matched; 19 M cedar shingles; concrete floor, 20 bbls. cement, 23 yards gravel, mixed 8 to 1; 10 rolls tar paper to put on two-ply thick; 100 lbs. 3½-in. nails; double boarding, 9 ft. high; 50 lbs. 5-in. nails, 200 lbs. 3-in. nails; 95 lbs. shingle nails; raftetrs, joists, etc.



Ground Floor Plan.

The stalls may be built of iron piping and the cow ties may be one of the numerous V-bar stanchions now on the market.

Build concrete floor with 9-10 inch elevated feed passage and make manure trench seven inches deep on cow stand side and drop walk behind cows, two inches lower than cow stand, thus giving a depth to trench at this side of five inches.

TIME FOR BUILDING A SILO

Fore-Sighted Farmers Will Not Put Off the Construction Until the Last Minute.

(By Joseph Newman, Illinois Dairymen's Association.)

Silos should be built in time to take care of the crops before frost comes, and the thrifty farmer will build as early as possible.

I built a round silo, 16 feet four inches in diameter by 30 feet high, and placed in it about seven acres of drilled corn will eared, and three acres of hill corn from the shock, all cut and blown into the silo, mixed as it went in and wet down well.

This made 125 tons of the best winter feed for dairy cows that I ever saw.

We started feeding it to 50 cows and ten head of young stock on December 1, and it was suffleient to last them until March 10.

The corn put in in this way furnished not only the roughage, but concentrates, and all needed to balance the ration was four pounds of gluten meal and four pounds of wheat bran per day for each cow.

Following this stock in the barnyard were about 30 hogs, shotes and sows, and with practically no other feed I never saw stock look any better on March 1.

We found the best way to feed was to feed the bran and gluten meal before and during milking time, and the ensilage after milking. The milk was bought by one of the large milk companies which supply Chicago with bottled milk and was pronounced by them a fine article, testing on the average about 3.7 per cent. butter fat by the Babcock test.

For a dairy of 50 cows, two round silos, each 18 feet in diameter by 36 feet high, should furnish enough for the winter's feeding and to carry the stock through the dry time the next fall.

In providing plenty of succulent food of this nature for the dairy milk can be made better and cleaper and more cows can be kept on the same number of acres.

I do not put anything on top of the silage after filling and did not lose six inches on top, and the pigs took care of that when it was thrown into the barnyard.

Not Sisters

Now and again you see two women passing down the street who look like sisters. You are astonished to learn that they are mother and daughter, and you realize that a woman at forty or forty-five ought to be at her finest and fairest. Why isn't it so?

The general health of woman is so intimately associated with the local health of the essentially feminine organs that there can be no red cheeks and round form where there is female weakness.

Women who have suffered from this trouble have found prompt relief and cure in the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It gives vigor and vitality to the organs of womanhood. It clears the complexion, brightens the eyes and reddens the cheeks.

No alcohol, or habit-forming drugs is contained in "Favorite Prescription." Any sick woman may consult Dr. Pierce by letter, free. Every letter is held as sacredly confidential, and answered in a plain envelope. Address World's Dispensary Medical Association, Dr. R.V. Pierce, Pres., Buffalo, N.Y.

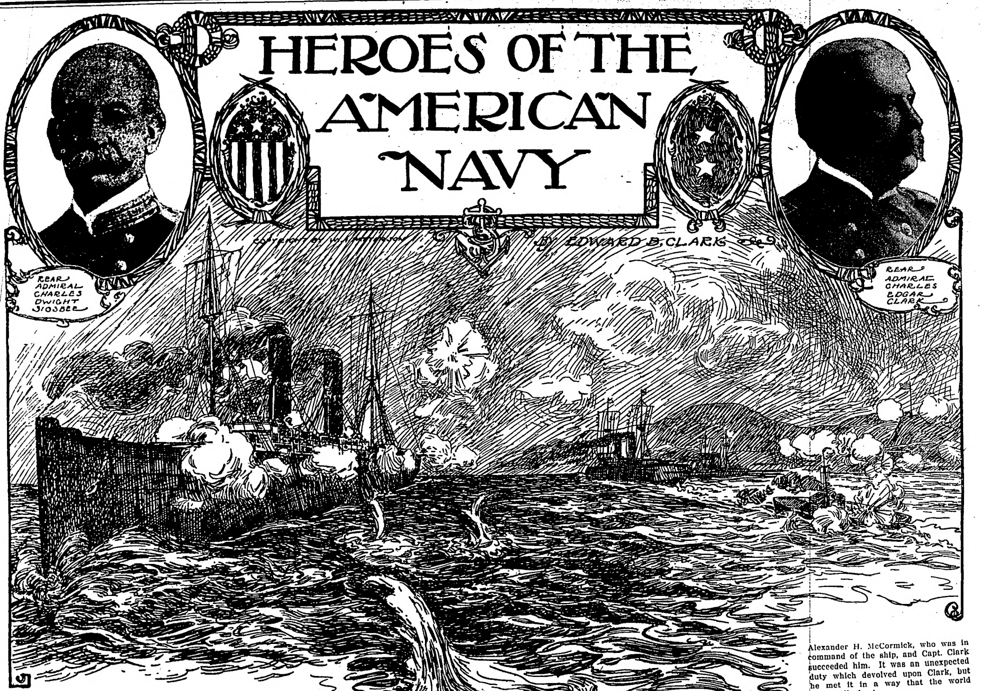
HEROES OF THE AMERICAN NAVY



REAR ADMIRAL CHARLES DWIGHT SIGSBEE
REAR ADMIRAL CHARLES EDGAR CLARK
COPYRIGHT BY W. A. PATTERSON

BY EDWARD B. CLARK

REAR ADMIRAL CHARLES DWIGHT SIGSBEE is on the retired list, and a fine old seaman has a landsman's berth for the rest of his life. The name Sigsbee is inseparably connected with the loss of the battleship Maine in Havana harbor on the night of February 15, 1898. It is, perhaps, not generally appreciated that naval authorities consider that in the writing of his first report of the disaster to the Maine Capt. Sigsbee marked himself as a commander of remarkable coolness and ability. The sentence in the report which brought the Maine's captain the commendation of his superiors and of all thinking men was: "Public opinion should be suspended until further report."

The Maine was sent to Havana harbor on a peculiarly delicate mission. In reality the vessel was there to protect American residents against the Spaniards in the city, who were becoming ugly. It was necessary, however, that Capt. Sigsbee should make it appear that the visit of the Maine was entirely friendly. After the Maine was destroyed the commander of the ship, instead of losing time in attempting to cast the blame for the disaster upon others than himself, and instead of following what would seem to be the natural course of making it appear that it was a Spanish act of treachery, wrote the words which made him famous, and gave "every chance for the cause of the explosion to be traced—to his own negligence, or to that of his officers, if such prove to be the case—in his efforts to avert war."

It is always a tremendous misfortune for a naval officer to lose his ship, no matter what the cause. There is always a feeling existing, regardless of the odds against which a vessel has to contend, whether of the fury of the storm or of the overweight of the enemy's shot and shell, that if handled by somebody else the vessel might have survived the conflict.

It undoubtedly was a sad blow to Capt. Sigsbee when war was declared against Spain that he was not given command of a battleship. The naval department, however, did the next best thing that it could do for him in ordering him to the deck of the St. Paul, which was a transatlantic liner, fast and mounting fairly heavy guns, and which had been pressed into the service as a scout cruiser.

It fell to Capt. Sigsbee's lot, however, to command his ship in one of the most notable engagements of the Spanish war. It is very possible that as much glory came to Sigsbee from this encounter as came to the commander of any battleship which was engaged in the fight off Santiago harbor with Cervera's Spanish squadron.

The St. Paul had an encounter with the Spanish torpedo boat Terror. The fight was of tremendous importance and of supreme interest to the naval authorities of the world, for it was the first time practically that a torpedo boat of this kind, and of which much was expected, went into battle against a practically unarmored vessel, but a vessel carrying serviceable guns and a crew of expert gunners.

The St. Paul was in the vicinity of San Juan, Porto Rico, June 22, 1898. It was there in the hope of discovering certain Spanish men-of-war which were thought to be in the vicinity. A little past noon on the twenty-second, Lieut. Patterson of the St. Paul saw a cruiser leaving the harbor of San Juan. Instantly the men of the St. Paul were called to quarters, Capt. Sigsbee taking the bridge. The cruiser turned out to be the Infanta Isabel, a Spanish man-of-war.

The St. Paul prepared to meet the Spaniard, but the enemy persisted in keeping under the protection of the shore batteries, though Sigsbee ran his vessel in so close that she was exposed for a long time to the missiles of the eight and 10 inch guns of the Spanish fort. If the Spaniards had been better marksmen it might have fared ill with the St. Paul, but Sigsbee knew with whom he had to deal and he took chances, as does every brave commander.

While attempting to draw the Infanta Isabel into battle the captain of the American ship saw the torpedo-boat destroyer Terror come out of the harbor under full steam and head for his ship. The Terror was making a dash for the St. Paul with the intention of sending a torpedo into her and sinking her, to keep company with Sigsbee's last vessel, the Maine. As a naval writer has put it, "at last the much boasted torpedo boat was upon trial under battle conditions."

The captain of the St. Paul held his fire until the rushing enemy, presenting only a small target, had reached a distance of about 5,400 yards and then there followed one of the finest exhibitions of American marksmanship that naval history shows. The distance was great, but from the deck of the St. Paul it would seem that the projectiles were falling close to the supposedly deadly torpedo boat foe.

Capt. Sigsbee in his official report told the subsequent story thus:

"Suddenly the Terror headed up into the wind, broadside to the St. Paul, as if injured, but kept up a fire from her battery, her shot falling short. I was looking at her from the upper bridge with binocular glasses of great power, and at this time I saw a shell explode, apparently against her hull, abaft the after smokestack.

"She immediately turned with port helm and stood in for the harbor at considerable speed, her behavior giving evidence of damage. Instead of standing in through the channel close to the Morro, whence she had issued to begin her attack, she fell a long distance to leeward. When down toward Cabras island she rounded to and stood southeastward toward the harbor, apparently not under good management. The Spanish cruiser showed concern by standing in after her."

The Spaniards were compelled to send the Terror aground to prevent her from sinking. It was found that three shells had struck her, killing and wounding many of her crew and effectually putting her out of action. The Infanta Isabel and another Spanish cruiser stayed under the protection of the batteries, refusing to answer Sigsbee's challenge to battle.

It is probable that every American naval officer will admit that Rear Admiral Charles Edgar Clark has had as varied a career of service as any man who ever trod the quarter deck. It seems likely—in fact, a search of the records shows nothing to the contrary—that Admiral Clark is the only sailor of the navy who ever fought North American Indians. The admiral's masterly sailing of the Oregon around the Horn, his magnificent handling of the same ship in the battle with the Spaniards off Santiago and divers other things which the old sailor has done well, have so made his latter service to shine that his early exploits, though bright enough in themselves, have been shadowed by contrast.

Precious few people know that when Clark was a youngster in the service he was thrown by force of the waves and circumstances into contact with warlike Indians of the northwest coast. Old settlers who dwell at the end of the Lewis and Clark trail will tell you to-day that Lieut. Clark in the trying situation of being surrounded by 400 savage reds, each one bent on taking his sailor scalp, conducted himself in a manner worthy of Carson, Bridger or any other of the old plainsmen, pathfinders and Indian fighters.

Early in July, 1868, Clark was the fifth officer in rank on board the old warship Suwanee, a battle-scarred veteran vessel of the civil war days. The Suwanee struck a storm off Vancouver island and it was one of the worst storms that the supposedly gentle Pacific ever allowed itself to be stirred to. Everything that seamanship knew how to do was done to save the ship, but there are storms that laugh at seamanship.

At the end the Suwanee was on the rocks off the northern end of Vancouver island. Most of the members of the crew were saved. When the storm abated it was possible for a large part of the survivors to make their way to the mainland, but it was necessary to leave a contingent of the crew on Hope island, where they were to await the return of boats for their relief.

Lieut. Clark was left in command of the camp on the island and of its 33 sailor occupants. The men left behind had precious little to eat. The sailor lives on the sea, but he does not take kindly to sea food. Clams, inferior oysters and fish of a kind less digestible than the sculpin formed the chief of their diet.

While the shipwrecked ones were doing their best to fight off famine 400 Indians, fully armed and ready for a massacre, appeared in sight of the camp. Lieut. Clark took part in the great battle of Mobile Bay, where he had torpedoes under him, Confederate war vessels all about him and Confederate batteries landward. He had shown that he knew what to do under such circumstances, but here he was confronted with something entirely new in the line of war problems. He proved equal to the savage occasion, however, and as the Indians swung around his camp in a circle to hem it in, he deployed his men so that they were sheltered from arrows and bullets and were prepared to hold off a horde of reds.

The Indians attacked the sailors and were met with the same kind of reception that they would have met if they were attacking time-tried plainsmen accustomed to every known method of the reds' warfare. The Suwanee's shipwrecked ones had little sleep for a day and two nights. They did not know at what hour during the darkness the Indians would close in on them, and so they lay awake with straining eyes, but with enough strength still in reserve, despite their shellfish diet, to fight gamely.

About an hour after sunrise one morning there was a commotion among the Indians. They were looking off toward the mainland. The commotion increased as the minutes went by and soon the whole band scuffled toward the north, where supposedly they had boats, for certain it is that a few hours later there was not a trace of a red to be found on the island. There was relief in sight for the shipwrecked ones, and it was a glimpse of the oncoming boats that had sent the Indians on the back trail.

The trip of the Oregon from San Francisco to Key West under the command of Capt. Clark has an enduring place in American naval history. Illness overtook Capt. Alexander H. McCormick, who was in command of the ship, and Capt. Clark succeeded him. It was an unexpected duty which devolved upon Clark, but he met it in a way that the world knows all about.

The Oregon arrived at Rio de Janeiro April 30, 1898, and it was there that the captain received a dispatch from Washington stating that war had existed between the United States and Spain since the twenty-first of the month. Capt. Clark mustered his crew and made the war announcement. The scene that followed was an inspiring one. Lieut. Eberle of the Oregon, in an article in the Century Magazine eight years ago, describes it thus:

"All hands were very anxious for news, and memorable were the cheers that greeted the news that war had been declared. In a few moments our band was on deck and between the rounds of cheers the strains of 'The Star-Spangled Banner' and 'Hail, Columbia' floated over the Brazilian fleet and the crowds that lined the wharves. The crew uncovered and stood at attention during the playing of the national anthem, and then followed more cheers and the inspiring battle cry, 'Remember the Maine!' a watchword often heard about the decks as the men turned to the coal barges and worked as they had never worked before. The intense heat and the long, trying working hours of those days and nights were borne without a murmur."

It was one of the Oregon's men who wrote: "We loved our captain and had such faith in him as a gentleman and a 'scrapper' after our own hearts that we were ready for any kind of a fight with him as a leader."

Rear Admiral Charles Edgar Clark went upon the retired list of the navy at an age two years younger than by the requirements of the law an army officer must leave the ranks. Why the naval law sends the sailors into retirement while the soldiers of the same age are still on the fighting line no one knows.

His Star Role

A theatrical manager had a stock company at Los Angeles. Business was bad and no money coming in. He hadn't paid a salary for months and had managed to keep his company together by advertising in San Francisco and elsewhere, holding out all sorts of promises.

The actors came, stayed until all their own money was gone, and then left. The manager made shift to keep his thespians contented by taking them on little excursions about the city when they were not working. One day he announced: "This afternoon, ladies and gentlemen, we shall visit the insane asylum, a most interesting place."

They went out and were shown through. Seated under a tree in the garden was a man who, over and over again, was counting his fingers and muttering: "Eeny—meeny—miny—moe—eeny—meeny—miny—moe."

"Who is this?" asked the manager.

"Strange case," said the attendant. "Found him in the street a few weeks ago.. He sits there all day and does that. Harmless, but apparently quite insane. We are giving him the best of attention in the hope that his reason may be restored."

The manager looked at the counter closely: "Bless my soul!" said the manager. "It resembles my former leading man, Simpson."

The man kept counting his fingers. "Really," said the manager, "It is a most extraordinary resemblance."

Meantime, the other actors and actresses and the attendant had gone on. "Tell me, my good fellow," said the manager, "are you not Simpson, the actor?"

"Cheese it!" said the man who was counting his fingers. "If they don't get onto me I can stay here all summer."—Saturday Evening Post.

WILD ANIMAL CLEARING HOUSE

WANT an aoudad? Want a ring-neck Swinhoe or a dogface baboon or anything else in the animal line? You can get them if you've the money—and you will not have to do much more than use the telephone and sign the check. For, let it be known, that in Kansas City you can buy anything in the animal line from a green-eyed mole to a pronghorn antelope, and if you've a lot of animals that you're tired of you can trade 'em off for new ones. For in Kansas City are the offices of one of the world's four clearing houses for animals—the Horne Zoological arena.

Over one ordinary desk in the office at 318 Keith and Perry building animals to the value of thousands of dollars pass every week—figuratively speaking, of course. From that desk they're sent all over the world, traded, bought, sold and rented. It's the desk of I. S. Horne, one of the owners of the arena.

As to the animals, they're in all parts of the world. Some of them are just commonly tame, others are tame enough to jump through hoops, lay dead, roll over and do 20 other perfectly good and guaranteed acts, while still others are still biting natives and playing hide and go seek with hunters in their native jungles—or plains, as the case may be.

The tame ones are at various parks, circuses and animal shows and are leased, rented or "hired out" for their keep. You can get those any time. The wild ones can be got, but, of course, that takes a little time. As for the prices, they're reasonable. You can take a perfectly docile and guaranteed-to-be-city-and-circus broke hippopotamus home for the reasonable sum of $3,000, no more than you would pay for a limousine touring car. So why buy motors while hippopotami are so cheap? Elephants rent from $100 a month on up. Common, ordinary lions cost $450, while the better grades are worth on up to $1,000. Bengal tigers come higher, with the market always standing pat at $1,000 to $1,200, while a chimpanzee, if he's good, costs the moderate sum of $450.

The Horne Zoological arena has been in existence in Kansas City for years, but, as most of its dealings are made outside the city, not much is known of it. And the size of the offices are no indication of the business, for every week enough business is done to equal that of a large mercantile establishment. Nothing costs less than $15 and from there on up to $1,500, and the greatest business usually is done in the high priced animals.

"Wish I could get my hands on a few more elk right away without having them caught," I. S. Horne was saying the other day when a visitor entered, "and say," he added to his stenographer, "tell Umpty-Umph & Company that I won't trade that bunch of elephants unless he throws in a Sunda tiger, one polar bear and a couple of leopards."

By this time the visitor was making his wants known. He had an idea that he would like a little zoo of his own, so he had gone there to find out about it.

"A zoo?" the animal dealer questioned. "Of course you'll want a good one."

"Oh, yes," the visitor answered vaguely; "thought I'd ask you about it. Now, what would you—"

"Advise? Why, let's see, of course you'd want a lion and some leopards and tigers. Pumas are nice and then, oh, yes, you must have a jaguar."

"Oh, yes," again came from the visitor. The animal man was busy.

"Now as to bears. You'd want a pair of polars—they're very popular now since the north pole was discovered—and a black bear and a grizzly and a sloth and a Kadiak. You'll need a hippopotamus and certainly you'd want a rhinoceros. No first-class zoo is complete without an Indian and an African elephant. Now there's the South American tapirs, a giraffe, a buffalo, some elk, a few deer, a couple of pronghorn antelope, an aoudad, or Barbary sheep, a Sing-Sing waterbuck, and then in the monkey class—"

"I couldn't very well keep those in the basement, could I?" the zoo wanter asked.

"Hardly," came dryly from the animal man.

"And the price?"

"Oh, about $50,000.

"Well, I don't guess I want any zoo," the visitor said slowly. But being there, he just stayed a little while longer and found out some things about the animal business.

"Much to do?" Horne asked. "Why, there's more than we can attend to right now. You see, the parks and zoos all over the United States are buying right now, while the circuses are selling. So it keeps us busy getting them in and shipping them out. Just in the last month we've sold nearly $33,000 worth of elk, and we've still got orders.

"Everybody's buying elk and polar bears—in fact, we've had the best polar bear market this year we've ever had. Sold nine in a month. Rhinoceroses are moving rather slowly, while hyppos are steady. The pheasant market is bearish, while the elephant trade is rather inclined to bull a bit now and then. Just a few weeks ago I took a flyer on a bunch of parrots that a circus wanted to get rid of and came out very well on it.

"So, you see, that's the way it goes. Right now it's elk and polar bears. In another month likely, everything may be going to tigers, while a month later no one will want anything except African lions and Indian elephants.

"Trade animals? Why, certainly. And often, we do more trading than selling. For instance, in the spring, when circuses are getting in menagerie stock that is good only for cages, I can take up a lot of untrainable stock from the animal shows and trade it into the circuses. Then leases on animals run out every once in a while and so it's traded in for new stuff upon which leases can be taken. Many of the animals in the shows are owned by us and rented out. For instance, right out in Denver there are three elephants belonging to us from which we get a rental of $1,000 a month."

What is perhaps the most famous bear in the west to-day, and the one seen by more people probably than an other, is the famous Hearst grizzly of the Golden Gate park, at San Francisco, Cal.

Old Monarch, as he is known, is said to tip the scale at 1,400 pounds. His capture was effected about 16 miles from Santa Paula, Cal., on Pine mountain.

Some two years before the midwinter fair of 1891-2 the bear was taken, but he does not seem to have suffered by his captivity in the least. If anything he has prospered.

During the winter his bearship eats but little—twelve to 14 loaves of bread will do for the three bears in the cage, although in the summer 35 are needed.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Uncle Sam Develops New Easter Lily

WASHINGTON.—The plant experts of the department of agriculture are turning their attention to things of beauty as well as usefulness, and several new flowers have been evolved by them. Next season in all probability some novel varieties of lilies which were originated in the department's greenhouses in Washington will be placed upon the market by growers, as well as a new summer-blooming dahlia.

"The growing of lilies in the United States," said Prof. B. T. Galloway, in charge of the bureau of plant industry, "is rapidly becoming an important industry. Large quantities of bulbs have in years past been imported from Bermuda, Japan and other countries, and the demand for the flowering plants seems to be on the increase.

"Various lines of work have been undertaken and carried out by our expert, Mr. Oliver, chiefly for the purpose of securing new types of lilies by hybridizing and crossing and to demonstrate the practicability of growing lilies in this country directly from seed."

One of the most promising of the hybrids has resulted from crossing the Philippine lily and the Bermuda lily. The Philippine lily takes two months to come into bloom from the period of planting the bulb, while the Bermuda and its various relatives require in the neighborhod of five months. It was thought that there would be a great saving if the time taken to force a good Easter lily could be reduced by a month or two.

With a view of bringing this about the hybridization of the Philippine and the Bermuda lily has been effected.

Question of Ham Raised in Washington

MISSOURI
VIRGINIA

MRS CHAMP CLARK of Missouri has entered a controversy which is in progress in Washington among society leaders, epicures and chefs as to the best way to cook a Virginia ham, by contending that a Missouri ham is the best, anyhow. The wife of the Democratic leader in the house of representatives takes direct issue with Gov. "Joe" Blackburn, Col. John A. Joyce, Mrs. F. Berger Moran and others who have declared in favor of hickory smoke with which to cure the ham, the light of the full moon in which to kill it, and that it must come from the "Mother of Presidents," for only there does the real aristocratic porker have its being. The controversy has become so hot that President Taft may be called upon to decide it.

"The Missouri ham is so far ahead of anything in the pig line introduced by Virginia or elsewhere," said Mrs. Clark, "that I can't understand how people can be so deceived. Isn't everything better in Missouri than elsewhere? Why, of course it is. Then, why shouldn't hams be superior? With us raising, curing, cooking and serving this dainty morsel is not only an art, but borders on the sacred things of our lives.

"Our pigs are raised with infinite care; they are not allowed to associate with those of the lower strata in life; iron-clad rules are observed in feeding and grooming them, and when at last they are doomed to die, we are almost as sorry as they can possibly be.

"But our qualms of conscience are assuaged when, after months of smoking in the dear old smokehouse, the hams are tenderly taken from their hooks and treated to a period of simmering (for you never boil a ham) and basting and browning and garnishing, then served and eaten with pure joy and gusto.

"They don't know what a really good piece of hog meat is in Virginia. I will admit, however, that I learned all I know about cooking ham from my friend Mrs. Burke of Alexandria. Mrs. Burke is a great-granddaughter of Thomas Jefferson, and she was telling me how the art of simmering the dainty came to be known in America.

Snakes in a Bag, Not Robbers' Loot

THEY get off some awful stories on the "old Sleuths," but this one is straight goods: R. F. Le Mat, a well-known Washington athlete, spent the summer "near to nature's heart" up in the wilds of Idaho. He started back attired in wild and woolly fashion, a pair of corduroy trousers, a big sombrero, and his face adorned with a huge goatee, all of which may at times be worn by confidence men, but were not in this case.

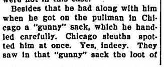
Besides that he had along with him when he got on the pullman in Chicago a "gunny" sack, which he handled carefully. Chicago sleuths spotted him at once. Yes, indeey. They saw in that "gunny" sack the loot of a train robbery that recently occurred in the middle west.

The fact that Le Mat seemed to be very careful of the sack and its contents was sure enough proof of "something," you see, and when he turned it over to a pullman porter paid him some money, and he immediately got the bag hidden out of sight, was just proof positive—well, not quite positive enough for arrest, but mighty good proof.

So two of the Chicago sleuths boarded the pullman, and they shadowed Le Mat to Washington, having telegraphed ahead for detectives to meet them at the Union station. The first man to greet Le Mat on his arrival was a Union station detective, who is a personal friend. Then Le Mat made his get-away, and the detectives from Chicago had a trip to Washington for no cost to themselves.

The gunnysack contained three big rattlesnakes, which now adorn the Washington zoo. And that ends the story of one lot of sleuths.

Upheld Mississippi Catfish's Honor



AMONG the employes of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, in Washington, where all the paper money that circulates in this country is printed, are some men so benighted as not to believe that Mississippi river catfish ever tip the scales at 100 pounds or more. William C. Deane, a prominent member of the Missouri society of the District of Columbia some time ago undertook to convince the doubting Thomases that catfish attain gigantic proportions in the Father of Waters.

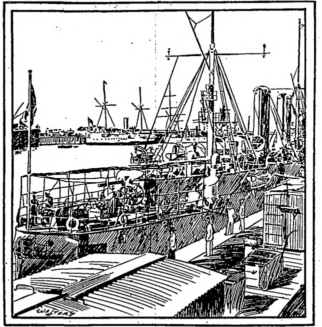
He declared that he had recently seen catfish caught that weighed upwards of 100 pounds. His associates in the bureau laughed him to scorn—made him real mad.

"I'll show you," quoth Deane. He proceeded to his comfortable home and informed Mrs. Deane that, for the first time in his life his word was doubted, and over a Mississippi river catfish at that. They put their heads together and composed a letter to the United States Fish Commission, asking that Deane's statement be verified, if possible, from the official records.

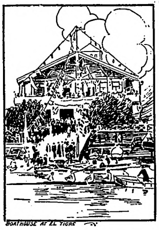
A reply was received instanter, Commissioner Bowers declaring that a 100-pound catfish is small for the Mississippi and showing that 300-pounders are not uncommon. Bearing this epistle in his hand, and with a serene smile on his countenance, Deane proceeded to his accustomed place in the bureau and called for the skeptics.

All hands were convinced and retreated in silence to their ink-stained presses. "I've seen many a big catfish in Missouri," said Deane, "but I was not prepared to go as far as Commissioner Bowers in attesting their size. I was shown myself and did some tall showing."

ARGENTINA'S CENTENNIAL YEAR



WARSHIPS AT THE DOCKS, BUENOS AIRES



BOATHOUSE AT EL TIGRE

AMONG the South American countries which will celebrate the hundredth birthday of their independence in 1910 is the Argentine Republic. The formal commemoration will be observed by expositions, both national and international, and there will also be various observances to perpetuate the memories of the struggle against Spain. But a century leaves no animosity. Argentina is still peopled by the descendants of the early Spaniards and among the monuments to be erected is one to Spain, writes Charles M. Pepper in the Christian Herald.

Argentina has much that makes it of interest to the people of the United States. In the first place there is its size. While not as big as our own country, it has more than 1,200,000 square miles of territory.

Then there is a similarity of products, in which it compares to our own Mississippi valley. It is one of the greatest wheat growing regions in the world, with unlimited possibilities for future crops. One of the homelike sights that an American sees in Argentina is the big steam threshers in harvest time. Most of these threshers, too, are of American make, as are nearly all the mowers and reapers.

Argentine has cattle ranches and sheep ranches which compare with those of Texas and Montana. Its beef and mutton help to feed a good many people in England and in other parts of the world, while its wool clip is woven into cloths by the weavers of England and Germany.

The history of the struggle which resulted in Argentina securing its independence is one of the most thrilling of the chapters in the revolt of the South American colonies from Spain. The struggle produced some heroic figures. The greatest of them was Gen. San Martin. He not only helped to free the disconnected territories or provinces which constituted Argentina and unite them, but he also bore a supreme part in the emancipation of other sections of South America. His feats in leading the troops through the snow-covered passes of the Andes and down to the plains of Chile are unsurpassed in military annals. They scaled snow-clad peaks and cleared pathways that it was declared no human feet could tread. San Martin led the victorious army in the Pacific coast countries till his meeting with Gen. Bolivar, the liberator. They were the two great military spirits, and it was felt certain that their rival ambitions would clash. But sooner than endanger the liberties of the newly enfranchised republic San Martin, who was the more generous of the two, after an interview with Bolivar, returned to Buenos Ayres. There he met the obstacles that constructive statesmen often meet in trying to reconcile and consolidate discordant local interests. He became a voluntary exile, and died at Boulogne, in France. One of the features of the centennial celebration is to be the erection of a monument to him at Boulogne.

Another hero of the Argentine struggle was Gen. Belgrano, who was second only to San Martin. A magnificent mausoleum holds his remains.

The seat of the Argentine declaration of independence was not at Buenos Ayres, or in the seacoast provinces, but far up in the northern interior, at a place called Tucuman. This is the Philadelphia of the Argentine Republic. On visiting it, some years ago, I found many interesting memorials of the declaration and of the congress which sat there. Tucuman is now a thriving city, a railroad center and the distributing point for a rich agricultural region.

While the plans for the centennial, as provided for by the Argentine congress last winter, contemplate the erection of many statues and monuments in the city of Buenos Ayres, these memorials are not to be limited to the capital. There are plans for the erection of graded schools in La Plata, Corrientes, Santa Fe and other provincial capitals. This is in line with the educational policy which, for more than 40 years, has been a leading feature in the progress of the country. It is due to Sarmiento, the schoolmaster president, who lived in the United States as a young man and was the close friend of Horace Mann and other noted educators. He established the astronomical observatory at Cordoba, the ancient seat of learning and the home of the university that still exists. American professors have been in charge of the observatory for many years. President Sarmiento also brought school teachers from New England, who had a very great influence in molding and developing the school system. A few years ago one of these teachers, a New England woman, died after many years of service. She was shown funeral honors by the government such as are accorded to high public officials.

Further evidence of the practical side of the centennial will be afforded by the various expositions. These include an exposition of fine arts, an agricultural exposition and an exposition of transportation. The latter will be chiefly a railway exhibit. This is fitting, because it is the railways which have made Argentina what it is and which will make it a much greater country in the future. So much of the country is flat and level that railway building has no more difficulties than on our western prairies, except when the foothills of the Andes are reached.

Argentina is a very hospitable country to foreigners. The language is Spanish and, as I have stated, the country is peopled by the Spanish race. But there is a very large admixture of other races, particularly from the Latin countries of Europe.

In the great city of Buenos Ayres, which now has a population of 1,200,000, there are said to be between 300,000 and 400,000 Italians. The Italians are also scattered throughout the country. There is a large German colony in Buenos Ayres, with German schools, a Lutheran church, and various societies, which remind one very much of the home life in the Fatherland.

METCHNIKOFF'S MIRACLE.

Two years ago Prof. Metchnikoff, the director of the Pasteur institute in Paris, promulgated his famous theory that a diet of sour milk would check the ravages of old age. Since then he has made additional researches resulting, we are told, in additional discoveries of inestimable value. In a word, the professor is now satisfied that he has discovered the cause of death and the means of retarding it, thus solving the problem of longevity. While his specific is still a secret, it is known that he proceeds on the principle that death is due to the formation of putrefactive bacteria in the large intestine and that for this process a corrective is within reach. The presumption is that inoculation is the method to be pursued. When man reaches his prime, instead of being permitted to take the downgrade, he will simply visit a laboratory, receive a vitalizing injection and remain, to all intents and purposes, immortal. The promise so extended is so delightful that skepticism seems invidious. Yet how many of us are there who, even on such impeccable authority as that of Prof. Metchnikoff, will nurse the golden dream of physical immortality? Both Christian teaching and the teachings of Nature herself point the other way.

Using the census of 1900 as a basis of calculation, it is estimated that the census of 1910 will show that the school population of the United States numbers probably 14,000,000 persons. The school army ten years ago was 13,367,147. Of that number 4,266,302 persons were between the ages of five and nine, and 6,453,394 ranged from nine to fourteen years old. About 13 per cent. of the whole number were from fifteen to seventeen years of age, and five per cent. were eighteen or upward. Of all the children between the ages of five and nine reported in the census of 1900 only about one-half attended school; of those ranging from nine to fourteen, four-fifths attended, and of those from fifteen to seventen a little more than two-fifths. Upward of 90 per cent. of the entire number were white. A school army of 14,000,000 for 1910 will be a national asset worth having. It will constitute a more convincing demonstration of the country's resources and strength than an army of 1,000,000 adults equipped with rifles and cannon.

A severer penalty than a fine should be awarded by the law to the class of miscreants who make a point of infesting the streets to insult respectable working girls. Young women who are compelled by the exigencies of life to support themselves, and who can choose neither the hour nor the place at which they must be on the public streets, should be especially protected from the scoundrels who hold that the fact a woman is compelled to earn her living is legitimate cause for insult, says the Baltimore American. If there is one class of persons for whom the streets should be safe, it is the young working girls of the community, who, as a class, are deserving of sincere respect.

It is not unlikely that commerce soon will bring to market the mixture of tea and flowers which was one of China's state secrets when the dowager empress held the reins of power. The empress was almost as famous for her tea as for her iron grip on the government. All guests at court were permitted to drink of the old woman's favorite brew, and tea experts tried to match the blend after they had failed to worm the secret from servants in attendance on the empress. Every attempt, however, to produce as delicious a cup of tea failed, and it was not until after the empress' death that the secret leaked out.

The rapid development of the aeroplane suggests that it will not be long before some daring aviator will undertake to cross the Atlantic. It will be done, eventually, and the powerful modern steamship may yet find that its most formidable competitor will be not on the seas, but in the air.

Throughout the country there is a clamor for more laws. Some people seem to think that when an evil appears all that is to be done is to "make a law." It isn't more law that is needed. It is more of the law-abiding spirit in the people that make the laws for themselves.

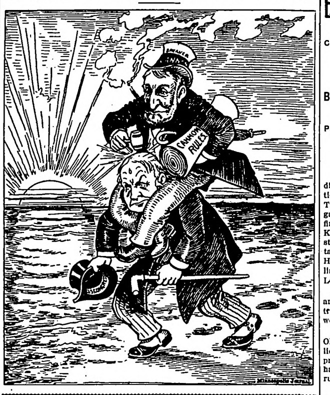
CAN CONGRESS SHAKE OFF THE "OLD MAN OF THE SEA?"



MME. STEINHEIL NEAR VICTORY

WOMAN'S COOK IS STRONG WITNESS FOR DEFENSE.

Prosecution's Chain of Evidence Broken—New Investigation May Be Ordered.

Paris.—The testimony Wednesday in the trial of Mme. Steinheil, charged with the murder of her husband and her stepmother, was distinctly favorable to the defendant.

Marietta Wolf, the cook in the Steinheil household, and her son, Alexandre, whose appearance was awaited with profound interest, threw no new light on the mystery, but by a further mass of contradictions strengthened the impression in the accused woman's favor. Mme. Steinheil's nurse also retracted her previous deposition in which she expressed the opinion that the defendant's illness after the crime was simulated, and Maurice Borderel, a wealthy merchant, whom the state assumes Mme. Steinheil desired to marry, testified to his absolute belief in her innocence.

The state's circumstantial case against Mme. Steinheil seems to be rapidly breaking down and it is already rumored that the trial may be abandoned and a new investigation ordered.

QUEEN OF TROTTERS DEAD

Hamburg Belle with Record of 2:01¼ Expires from Pneumonia on Georgia Farm.

Thomasville, Ga.—Hamburg Belle, 2:01¼, queen of the trotting turf, is dead.

Though brought south to escape the rigors of a northern winter, the famous mare died at the stock farm of her owner, near this place, of pneumonia.

Hamburg Belle was bought by Mel Hanna of Cleveland, O., a few months ago for $50,000. The mare registered as Sally Simmons II., made three world's records at the North Randall track near Cleveland on August 25 last, in her match race with the black horse Uhlan. Her first heat was trotted in 2:01¼, the fastest mile ever trotted in a race, and two seconds faster than the previous record held by Cresceus. The second heat was trotted in 2:01¾, the fastest second heat trotted in a race, and the race itself was the fastest two heats.

GOTCH WINS FROM ITALIAN

World's Champion Wrestler Has But Little Trouble in Defeating Foreign Opponent.

Chicago,—Frank Gotch, champion wrestler of the world, defeated Giovanni Raicevelch, the Italian champion, in two falls Tuesday night at the Coliseum before an immense crowd. Gotch secured the first fall by a crotch and arm-lock hold in 16 minutes and 28 seconds.

The second fall was obtained in much quicker time, the Iowa man throwing the Italian by a cross-leg hammer and wrist-lock hold in 5:25.

TRADE SCHOOLS ARE URGED

Industrial Education Is Advocated in Report Made to Federation of Labor Convention.

Toronto, Ont. — Organized labor's attitude on the vital question of industrial education was set forth in a report to the convention of the American Federation of Labor by the special committee appointed by authority of the Denver convention to investigate the subject.

The committee, of which John Mitchell is chairman, held three meetings during the year in New York, Washington and Toronto.

"It is believed," says the report, "that the future welfare of America largely depends on the industrial training of our workers and protecting them. The inquiries of the committee seem to indicate that if the American workman is to maintain the high standard of efficiency, the boys and girls of the country must have an opportunity to acquire educated hands and brains, such as may enable them to earn a living in a self-selected vocation and acquire an intelligent understanding of the duties of good citizenship.

"We favor the establishment of schools in connection with the public school system at which pupils between the ages of 14 and 16 may be taught the principles of the trades, not necessarily in separate buildings, but in separate schools adapted to this particular education and by competent and trained teachers.

Toronto, Ont.—If President Samuel Gompers, Vice-President John Mitchell and Secretary Frank Morrison of the American Federation of Labor eventually have to serve jail sentences for contempt of court it will not be due to lack of support from trades unionists. The executive council of the federation recommended to the annual convention that an appeal be taken to the United States supreme court, both in the Bucks Stove & Range Company's injunction case and in the contempt proceedings growing out of it. That the convention will ratify the recommendation seems certain, and that the three labor leaders and their fellow officers will be re-elected for another year is predicted. A vigorous denunciation of the use of labor injunctions and of the denial of trial by jury was embodied in the council's report.

BANKER SHOT DEAD

CASHIER OF NEW ALBANY BANK SLAIN AND PRESIDENT WOUNDED.

BANDIT USES STOLEN AUTO

Police in Motor Boat Pursue Youth Who Tried to Hold Up Bank and Capture Him After an Exciting Chase.

Louisville, Ky.—The youthful bandit who entered the Merchants' National bank at New Albany, Ind., Thursday, and, after killing J. Hangary Fawcett, the cashier, with the first bullet, turned his weapon on John K. Woodward, president of the institution, and shot him, probably fatally, was identified as Thomas J. Hall, 17 years old, by his father William J. Hall, a furniture dealer of Louisville.

John R. Tucker, negro chauffeur of an automobile in which the bandit tried to make his escape, was also wounded and may die.

After an exciting chase down the Ohio river by a motor boat full of police, the bandit was captured. The prisoner was saved from a mob which had gathered to lynch him, only by a ruse.

As the bandit entered the door of the bank he ordered everyone to hold up their hands. An instant later he began firing with both guns.

Fawcett was shot through the chest and neck and died almost instantly. President Woodward was shot through the liver and intestines. Tucker, the chauffeur, who lives in Louisville, was shot through the body.

Following the shooting the murderer rushed from the bank and tried to make his escape in an automobile, which he had taken from the curb in front of the residence of its owner, Mrs. Walter Escott, in Louisville, forcing Tucker at the point of a gun to drive him to New Albany. But the chauffeur, paralyzed with terror and apparently incapable of action, sat still.

The robber jumped from the car and sent a bullet through the negro's body. Turning down the river bank, a distance perhaps of two blocks, the youth ran with the speed of a deer. He quickly appropriated a skiff at the dock and was on his way to the Kentucky side before the frightened citizens of New Albany knew what had transpired.

An alarm was given through a megaphone on a dredge-boat and in a short time the police of the little city had started in pursuit in a fast motor boat, capturing their man, and had brought him to shore, only to confront the new peril of a lynching.

By a clever ruse, however, Capt. Adams of the police stood off the crowd of 200 which crowded around the dock as the police boat landed. Commanding the prisoner to lie down the captain announced to the crowd that the man had taken poison and was dead, meanwhile carrying him to the patrol wagon and giving the word to drive ahead. The bandit was taken to the New Albany jail. A few moments later he was removed to the Southern Indiana reformatory at Jeffersonville to escape the mob, which would not be quieted and which had assembled around the jail.

He seemed confused, but is apparently not insane. He confessed that he planned the robbery of the bank and says he had no assistance.

JAMAICA CABLE IS CUT OFF

Weather Officials at Washington Believe There Has Been a Submarine Earthquake.

Washington. — Weather reports from Kingston, Jamaica, which the bureau usually receives daily, have failed to come since last Saturday and officials of the service have been without information regarding what has occurred there because of the break in the cable.

There has been no general tropical disturbance in other West Indian islands and the weather bureau officials are inclined to believe that a submarine earthquake has caused the interruption.

Hypnotized Man Dies.

Somerville, N. J.—As the result of a hypnotic experiment Robert Simpson is dead and Prof. Arthur Everton of Newark, the hypnotist, is under arrest. Simpson was hypnotized at a performance in a theater here Monday night. After placing the man in a cataleptic state the hypnotist performed many tests in the presence of the audience. When the time came to end the exhibition, however, Prof. Everton found that his work, to all apearance, had been too thorough. The subject could not be revived. In alarm the hypnotist called on physicians, who, after laboring a long time over Simpson, pronounced him dead.

BOY BANDIT KILLS TWO MEN

PROBABLY FATALLY WOUNDS SELF IN ATTEMPT SUICIDE.

Youth Robs Bank Twice Within Month, Is Driven to Bay by Mob.

Eudora, Kan. — Driven to bay by an armed mob, Earl Bullock, the 17-year-old bandit of Lawrence, Kan., who twice within the last month has robbed the Eudora State bank, murdered a policeman and shot another man, probably fatally wounded himself in an attempt to commit suicide near here.

Bullock attempted suicide following his second robbery of the bank here and his shooting of Fred Starr, cashier of the Kaw Valley State bank of Eudora, who was in the Eudora State bank with his day's clearings. Accompanied by William McKay, 15 years old, of Jacksonville, Fla., Bullock held up the bank. Although Starr offered no resistance to the hold-up, Bullock shot him through the jaw. Snatching more than $800, Bullock fled, followed by his companion. Each youth had two revolvers.

Harry Wilson, cashier of the robbed bank, spread the alarm, and a crowd of citizens, armed with shotguns, rifles and revolvers, pursued the boy bandits across the fields. In attempting to swim the Kaw river the boys lost ground, and a few minutes later the mob was at their heels. McKay surrendered, but Bullock, wrenching the revolvers from his faltering partner's hands, sped on into a patch of wood where he shot himself.

FASTENS CRIME ON MOTHER

Clara Brodenheyer Betrays Maternal Parent as Slayer of Father Three Years Ago.

Chicago. — After three years of silence, Clara Brodenheyer betrayed her mother as the slayer of her father, Henry Brodenheyer, a jeweler of Madison, Wis. She explained one of the most baffling mysteries the police have had in years and cleared herself from any share in the crime.

Mrs. Brodenheyer had been committed to the Dunning asylum for the insane, where she is safe from prosecution for the murder, unless she should be declared sane.

The jeweler, the girl said, was enticed to a deserted slaughter-house on a farm near Madison and shot by his jealous wife. The wife and daughter, the young woman confessed, dragged the body to a swamp in their frenzied efforts to shield the mother from paying the penalty for the crime.

Detective O'Donnell of Chicago, accompanied by Prosecuting Attorney Vreland Mason and Sheriff John Halbach of Madison, Wis., went out to the Dunning asylum and saw Mrs. Brodenheyer, who was sent their five weeks ago. After being told that her daughter had confessed she confirmed the story.

Without betrayal of emotion she admitted shooting her husband because she thought that he was guilty of infidelity.

Her mental condition is such that Attorney Mason is in doubt if she can be placed on trial for the crime.

GIRL WALKS FORTY MILES

Scantily Clad Young Society Woman Escapes from Insane Asylum and Is Found Exhausted.

Kenosha, Wis. — Scantily clad, Miss Eleanor Joslin, a former Denver society girl, escaped from the Waufatosa asylum and walked 40 miles to Kenosha. She made the trip in 12 hours.

Friends in Kenosha, at whose residence she knocked, took her in, bundled her into bed and summoned a physician. The girl was exhausted by her trip, but had suffered no serious harm from the exposure. She has been taken back to the asylum.

Miss Joslin made the journey clad only in shoes, stockings, a skirt and a shirt waist. Her waist and skirt were torn in shreds upon her arrival, she having crawled through fences to hide whenever she saw any one approaching along the highway. The shoes were worn through, and her feet were bleeding.

Disappointment over her parents' refusal to allow her to unite with a religious order is given as the cause of Miss Joslin's mental condition.

GREAT MEETING OF FARMERS

National Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, Is Holding Its Annual Session in Des Moines, Ia.

Des Moines, Ia. — The forty-third annual session of the National Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, convened Wednesday morning in the Hotel Savoy, Nahum J. Taking Care of Yourself.

There never was a time when people paid as much attention to their health and strength as they do now. Time was when fine stock and fine horses were fed more carefully than human beings.

The result of properly balanced rations has worked wonders with stock and recent experiments are proving that the same thing is true of mankind.

It has been found that Quaker Oats eaten often and regularly taking the place of heavy, greasy foods will work wonders in the health and strength of a family.

School children fed frequently on Quaker Oats thrive physically and are always capable of the best work at school. For athletes, laborers, it is the best food.. One of the attractive features of Quaker Oats is the perfect way it is packed. Besides the regular size package there is the large size family package. 10

POOR WITNESS FOR FRIEND

Deacon's Brief Emphatic Testimony Probably Somewhat Impressed the Jury.

Deacon Stephen Potter, one of the pioneers of Utica, N. Y., was a man of great eccentricity but high moral character. The deacon will speak the truth and shame the devil," was often said of him.

On one occasion a friend was engaged in a lawsuit in regard to some land a few miles from Utica. He held the land at a high price. During the trial he called Deacon Potter as a witness, to prove how valuable the land was. The deacon was sworn and asked if he knew the land.

"Yes," he replied, "I know every foot of it."

"What do you think it is worth, Mr. Potter?" was the next question.

The old man paused a moment and then said, slowly: "If I had as many dollars—as my yoke of oxen—could draw—on a sled—on glazed ice—I vow—I would not give—a dollar an acre for it!"—Youth's Companion.

When it came time for Mrs. Bluffer to pack her trunk and depart from the resort where she had spent many pleasant days, where she had been the cynosure of all eyes, where she had flirted and gossipped (and been gossiped about), she visited the proprietor.

"I've just received a check for $50 from my husband," she told him. "You will honor it, won't you?"

The proprietor bowed and rubbed his hands.

"My dear Mrs. Bluffer," he ventured. "I will not only honor it, but will fall down and worship it."

An Entirely Selfish Theorist.

"Do you believe in the theory of reincarnation?" asked the serious girl.

"You mean to ask if I think we'll keep coming back to the earth again and again?" rejoined the flippant young man.

"Yes."

"I have my doubts about it. The creditors may all come back, but we debtors are apt to go wandering along to other planets if we can possibly arrange it."

CAREFUL DOCTOR

Prescribed Change of Food Instead of Drugs.

It takes considerable courage for a doctor to deliberately prescribe only food for a despairing patient, instead of resorting to the usual list of medicines.

There are some truly scientific physicians among the present generation who recognize and treat conditions as they are and should be treated regardless of the value to their pockets. Here's an instance:

"Four years ago I was taken with severe gastritis and nothing would stay on my stomach, so that I was on the verge of starvation.

"I heard of a doctor who has a summer cottage near me—a specialist from N. Y., and as a last hope, sent for him.

"After he examined me carefully he advised me to try a small quantity of Grape-Nuts at first, then as my stomach became stronged to eat more.

"I kept at it, and gradually got so I could eat and digest three teaspoonfuls. Then I began to have color in my face, memory became clear, where before everything seemed a blank. My limbs got stronger and I could walk. So I steadily recovered.

"Now, after a year on Grape-Nuts I weigh 153 lbs. My people were surprised at the way I grew fleshy and strong on this food."

TAX CASE IS ARGUED

SUPREME COURT ASKED TO PASS UPON VALIDITY OF TERRITORIAL CHARTER.

BELIEVED THE STATE WILL WIN

State Right to Levy 4 Per Cent Upheld By Attorneys-General Simpson and Peterson.

Washington.—The fate of about $800,000 of back taxes due the state in railroad taxes, is now in the hands of the United States supreme court. Arguments were concluded in the gross earnings tax case, and Attorney General Simpson, Assistant Attorney General Peterson and W. R. Begg, attorney for the Great Northern road, have returned to St. Paul.

The impression prevails here that the state of Minnesota stands much more than an even chance to win the present suit. This belief was borne out by the questions asked by members of the court during the final arguments. The questions were directed mainly toward determining the construction which had been given in the past by the Minnesota courts to the territorial charter of the Great Northern, but indicated an attitude of mind on the part of the court which tended to support the state's side of the case. The Great Northern had refused to pay more than a 3 per cent tax on any of its earnings within the state of Minnesota.

The road's principal contention, however, is as to the so-called "main line" from St. Paul to Breckenridge and the so-called "branch line" from East Minneapolis to Sauk Center. If the Great Northern secures a decision which affirms its right to a 3 per cent tax on these two original lines, authorized by the territorial charter, it will consider its case won. The state, on the other hand, expects to secure authority to levy the 4 per cent tax on the earnings of all the lines operated by the Great Northern.

Formerly Held Valid?

The state's case was presented in a forcible manner by Attorney General Simpson and Assistant Attorney General Peterson. Mr. Begg, for the Great Northern, set up the plea that up to the time of the recent decision in this gross earnings case, by the Minnesota supreme court, that body had always held the territorial charter of the Great Northern to be valid. For this reason, he said, a property right had been created. The Great Northern, he asserted, when it made the lease of the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba, had a right to believe that it had secured the privilege of immunity from other taxation than specified in this territorial charter, namely, 3 per cent.

Attorney General Simpson declared that no such property right existed. He cited opinions to prove that the real question now at issue, the right of the state to levy taxes, had never been before the court as to the Great Northern's territorial charters. The general rule of practice, he pointed out, is that a state's right to levy taxes cannot be contracted away, and in the present case he asserted the courts had never established proper rights by holding the old territorial charter to be binding upon the present state, as to its tax provisions. The state also made the point that the territorial charter, issued in 1857 to the Minnesota and Pacific, under which the Great Northern claims immunity from more than a 3 per cent tax, had been superseded by the new charter of 1865, issued by the present state of Minnesota, and which does not give a specific 3 per cent tax to the assignees of the old Minnesota and Pacific.

The case of the Great Western road, similar in many respects to that of the Great Northern, was not argued before the court, both sides agreeing to submit it on briefs.

The Great Western claims to have a charter right to a 2 per cent tax.

"SIX-FER" CASE DELAYED.

Lawyers Find Trial in Supreme Court Off Until Thanksgiving.

Washington, Nov. 10.—Frank Healy, city attorney of Minneapolis, and M. M. Thygeson, attorney for the Twin City Rapid Transit company, reached Washington to find out what is delaying the hearings of the six-for-a-quarter street car cases in the United States supreme court.

The attorneys found that work in the court is badly congested because of the death of Judge Peckham and that the street car case will probably not come up until after the Thanksgiving recess.

Mr. Healy said his department is ready to argue the case and is anxious to have it come to an issue. The city attorney will remain in Washington two or three days on other business.

WITCHCRAFT IN MINNESOTA.

Five Members of One Family in Insane Asylum.

St. Peter. — Three members of a single Lake Prairie family were taken before the probate court of Nicollet county and committed to the St. Peter state hospital for the insane by Judge Henry Moll. Their commitment has revived interest in the Lake Prairie witchcraft case, one of the strangest ever known in this section.

On March 25, 1907, Miss Ellen Peterson, of Lake Prairie township then a girl of 18, was arrested on a charge of assault preferred by Mrs. Martha S. Norlin, a neighbor. When arraigned in a justice court the girl answered the preliminary questions intelligently enough, but followed them with the flat assertion that Mrs. Norlin had bewitched the entire Peterson household. She told how the alleged evil influence of the neighbor had caused cows to go dry, prevented cream from ripening, brought about the death of poultry and precipitated various other calamities. To punish Miss Peterson and a married sister, Mrs. F. G. Lilliquist intercepted Mrs. Norlin as she was passing the Peterson dwelling and pounded her unmercifully.

When the girl was being examined in court her brother, Christian Larson, sat at her side, and after she had been sentenced to serve 16 days in jail, he made a protest and threatened to kill Mrs. Norlin. A warrant was issued for him and he was placed under $200 bonds to keep the peace. Being unable to furnish bonds he went to jail for six months.

Following his release there was no recurrence of the trouble until Saturday, when Ellen Peterson and her mother, Mrs. Christian Peterson, attacked Mrs. Norlin in front of their home and gave her another beating. She promptly notified the county officials, and Sheriff August Olson and Deputies C. J. Norman and James Myers went to the Peterson home and placed them under arrest. All resisted stubbornly, and were only overcome after a hard struggle.

In the probate courtroom they declined to answer questions, but sat mute and stolid until committed. Lars Peterson, husband of Mrs. Christian Peterson, has been an inmate of the state hospital for 33 years, and their son-in-law, F. G. Lilliquist, was sent there in 1902. This last triple commitment, therefore, makes five members of the family receiving treatment at the institution.

ELECTION CLERKS ARRESTED.

Duluth.—Louis M. Hooper, Charles Charles Stark and Frank Schultz, election clerks last November in the Sand Lake precinct, Itasca county, were arrested by order of County Attorney Price on a charge of perjury.

The arrest came about through their testimony in the case of a government scaler named Charles Dahlgren, charged with illegal voting. Dahlgren was said to have voted at Sand Lake under the name of Frank Hues.

The election clerks testified that they did not know Dahlgren, whereas, it is asserted, they testified in the sheriff contest in Itasca county last fall that Dahlgren voted under the name of Hues.

FOUR CENTS ON DOLLAR.

Minneapolis.—Jesse Van Valkenburg, executor of the estate of the late John G. Lund, filed his report in the probate court, showing that only $21,799.60 is available to meet debts amounting to more than $500,000. This is about 4 cents on the dollar.

POULTRY AND BEES

BREEDING THE PEKING DUCK

Mature Earlier and Thrive Better Than Any Other Breed—Flourish Without Water.

Peking ducks were imported into this country from China in 1873. They surpass all other breeds as a table fowl. In the vicinity of most of the large cities they are raised by the thousands for this purpose, and the industry is very profitable. They are good layers, and the supply of good breeding stock seldom equals the demand. There is also a good demand for eggs for hatching. They mature earlier and thrive better without water for swimming than any other breed of ducks, although they enjoy it if they have it. They should always have water deep enough so they can submerge the head and eyes. It is better for the ducklings not to have water to swim in until nearly fully feathered. The little ducks grow rapidly, and under favorable conditions reach a marketable size when two weeks old, often weighing from five to six pounds and at a less cost per pound than any other fowl. They are easily confined and need only a very low fence. They are much more intelligent than chickens, and seem to understand what they are expected to do. We usually set the eggs under the hens, they are strong when they leave the shell and after a week or ten days with the hen they can usually take care of themselves if protected from cold, rains, and vermin. When they are growing rapidly they consume considerable feed, but contrary to a quite general impression they do not consume as much for a pound of growth as chickens, as they are great foragers.

TO KEEP TURKEYS HEALTHY

Effective All-Around Mixture, Preventive of Disease and Also Valuable Disinfectant.

A good and cheap all-around remedy and preventive of disease in turkeys is the "Douglas Mixture." It is also a good disinfectant and is so cheap that it may be used freely in coops, buildings or perches.

The formula is as follows: One pound of copperas, one ounce of sulphuric acid (oil of vitriol), two gallons of water. Give one teaspoonful to a quart of drinking water. It should not be given continuously, but once or twice a week.

It is as good a remedy as is needed for roup, but if the turkeys' quarters are kept clean and dry the mixture need only be given as a preventive.

Another preventive of that dread disease roup is to smudge the turkeys occasionally with sulphur fumes, but they must not be subjected to the fumes for more than a few seconds at a time, or the fumes will kill them

Ready for Thanksgiving.

To Kill Weevil.

Weevil in grain in bins can be destroyed by the use of carbon bisulphide, a liquid which readily vaporizes in the open air. It is comparatively cheap and comes in sealed tin cans and can be purchased at drug stores. In using, pour into shallow pans at the top of the grain bin, and close tightly all doors or other openings while the liquid is vaporizing. Do the work in the daytime, when no lantern or artificial light will be necessary, for the vapor of carbon bisulphide is highly inflammable and explosive, and there is danger of a serious fire when flame is brought into its presence.

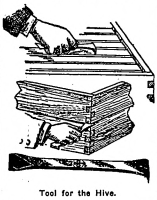
Winter Shelters.

The winter shelters for our domestic animals are not too good, but in many cases they are too close. They lack the proper ventilation and the admission of an abundance of direct sunlight and in some cases filth is allowed to collect and remain in them too long, making them otherwise insanitary.

HANDY TOOLS FOR THE HIVE

Plain Flat Piece of Steel, Fattened and Sharpened at Ends, Gives Satisfaction.

For some years we have been experimenting upon several forms of hive-tools. We have had different models sent to us from all over the country, and one or two have been sent from far-away Australia, writes E. R. Root in Gleanings in Bee Culture. We finally had our blacksmith make up from old buggy-springs several styles and placed them among our apiarists, asking them to select the one that seemed to suit their porpose best. Among all the tools that were submitted a plain flat piece of steel, flattened and sharpened at both ends in the form of a chisel, one end bent over like a hoe, seemed to give the best satisfaction. See illustration herewith.



Tool for the Hive.

It is something that any blacksmith can make out of an old buggy-spring or any good piece of spring steel. It must not be tempered too hard or it will break. Each end should be fattened out while hot, and brought to an edge. One end is bent to a right angle, and the other left straight. The tool is then taken over to an emery wheel or grindstone and finished up. Care should be taken to have the edges straight and square.

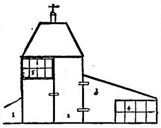
The hooked end is ordinarily used for scraping propolis or wax off the frames or bottom-boards, while the other end (also useful for scraping) is pushed between the two parts of the hive; but the drawing shows the tool held improperly. The bent or curved end should be placed directly against the palm in order that sufficient pressure may be exerted to shove the other or straight end between the two hive parts.

Either end of the tool may be used for separating frames.

LIGHT, AIRY POULTRY HOUSE

Can Be Built by Any Ingenious Farmer from Illustration and Description Given.

This poultry house can be built by any ingenious farmer from the drawings and descriptions given here. The framework should be made of 2x4-inch stuff, sheathing for the main part of the building. It is never a good plan to use old boards in building a poultry house, because they harbor insects. Better use new material and cover thoroughly with paint, inside and out.



Airy Poultry House.

The figures in the cut represent the following: 1, nests; 2, door; 3, scratching room; 4 and 5, windows, and, 6, ventilator. This is as house appears before being covered with building paper or roofing. Ground dimensions, 6x10 feet.

POULTRY NOTES.

If lice were good to eat, many a hen could get fat.

A good cockerel may be bought cheaper now than later on.

To raise pigeons for profit, you should keep them confined.

Some hens are liars. They don't always lay an egg when they cackle.

Stock selection plays an important part in successful chicken raising.

Poultry need sunlight and fresh air as much as the plants in the field.

Lack of grit causes more sickness among pigeons than poor feed or exposure.

The common inverted V-shaped coop is the best for confining hen and chickens.

A safe, simple tonic for pigeons is made by placing a piece of gentian root in the drinking water.

Some hens are regular gad-abouts and, unless they are confined, will walk their chickens to death.

If the soil in the poultry yard is not of a sandy or loose nature, dust baths must be provided.

Poultry neglected during the warm months will be slow at going into profit in the fall and winter.

The hen that does all her laying during the summer had best be disposed of along with her chicks.

Many a flock is well kept, so well that just a little fresh meat or vegetables would set them to laying.

A pale comb is not always a sign of disease, but that eggs are not kept in stock for present delivery.

GOING UP!

City ways were not altogether new to him, but, as he waited at the elevator shaft, in one of Omaha's large office buildings, he said to his companions.

"Well, I'll be hanged if that isn't a beater."

"Why, what?"

"Just look at that confounded railroad advertising on an Omaha elevator—UP! What won't they do next?"

His companion replied, "Sh—, Sh—, those letters mean 'up.'"

When I see that word, this jingle always comes to my mind:

'Whenever the little word 'up' you see,
Think of Safety, Speed, Service via U. P.'

You will see that word at almost every passenger elevator in the country, but before you leave for the West, be sure to buy your ticket via "The Safe Road to Travel."

"Dr. Cook tells us that the north pole is not larger than a quarter of a dollar," says the Montgomery Advertiser. However, a quarter of a dollar sometimes looks as large as the whole side of a barn.

When a man returns from a visit to his folks, his wife looks at him as much as to say: "What have they been doing to poison your mind against me now?"

Remedies are Needed

Were we perfect, which we are not, medicines would not often be needed. But since our systems have become weakened, impaired and broken down through indiscretions which have gone on from the early ages through countless generations, remedies are needed to aid Nature in correcting our inherited and otherwise acquired weaknesses. To reach the seat of stomach weakness and consequent digestive troubles, there is nothing so good as Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, a glyceric compound, extracted from native medicinal roots—sold for over forty years with great satisfaction to all users. For Weak Stomach, Biliousness, Liver Complaint, Pain in the Stomach after eating, Heartburn, Bad Breath, Belching of food, Chronic Diarrhea and other Intestinal Derangements, the "Discovery" is a time-proven and most efficient remedy.

The genuine has on its outside wrapper the Signature R.V. Pierce M.D.

You can't afford to accept a secret nostrum as a substitute for this non-alcoholic, medicine OF KNOWN COMPOSITION, not even though the urgent dealer may thereby make a little bigger profit.

Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets regulate and invigorate stomach, liver and bowels. Sugar-coated, tiny granules, easy to take as candy.

A House In Pompeii.

In the exhumation of Pompeii one house was discovered which was evidently being repaired when the volcanic storm that overwhelmed the city hurled it to the ground. Painters, decorators and cleaners must have been busy at the very moment of the catastrophe. Painters' pots and brushes and workmen's tools were scattered all over the house. Telltale spots of whitewash starred wall and floor. Such domestic implements as pots and kettles had been bundled up in a corner all by themselves. There was a bronze dish in waiting before the oven and on the dish a sucking pig ready to be baked. But the oven was already engaged with its full complement of bread. So the pig had to wait. It, however, never entered the oven after all, and the loaves were not taken out. They had remained where placed to bake, it is calculated, close upon 2,000 years. There were twenty-three of them, rather crusty, of course, and somewhat dark colored, but otherwise perfectly preserved.

Whitefield on Love and Marriage.

George Whitefield, the most persuasive preacher England has produced, who died on Sept. 30, 1770, could appeal so powerfully to the emotions that he once enticed all the money from the pocket of the prudent Franklin. Yet he strangely anticipated some modern unromantic views on the subject of marriage. In 1740 he applied to the parents of a young lady for the hand of their daughter, adding, "If I know anything of my own heart I am free from that foolish passion which the world calls love."

When this prosaic proposal was declined the undaunted Whitefield married an elderly Welsh widow "neither rich nor beautiful." This "merry widow" did not make a congenial helpmate, and Whitefield remarked, with refreshing candor, that "her death set 'his' mind at rest!"—Westminster Gazette.

Catching Monkeys.

Ringtailed monkeys, which rank among the most valuable, commercially speaking, of the small animals, are caught in an interesting way. A cocoanut is split in two and a banana with a piece of wood running through it placed lengthwise through the nut, the two halves of which are drawn together by wires. Then a hole is cut just large enough for the monkey's paw to enter. The monkey spies the tempting nut from his tree. He hops down, looks it over, sees the hole and smells the banana inside. He is fond of bananas. Putting his paw in, he grasps it, but the wood prevents it from coming out. Then the catchers appear, and the monkey runs for a tree. But he cannot climb because of the cocoanut on his paw, and he will not let go of that, so he is captured, pawing wildly at the tree trunk.

The Experiment Failed.

When a small boy mentioned in Short Stories grows up the scientific curiosity he displayed may be a valuable possession. Meanwhile his mother objects to it.

"Ma," remarked the boy, "isn't it funny that everybody calls little brother a bouncing baby?"

"Why do you think it's funny, William?" asked his mother.

"Because when I dropped him off the porch this morning he didn't bounce a bit; he just hollered."

How Toucans Roost.

Nothing could be more eccentric to our eyes than the way in which toucans go to roost. The bird does not "tuck its head under its wing, poor thing!" and so settle down, but packs itself up in most orderly fashion. The tail is turned forward over the back, in the soft feathers of which the gigantic bill is hidden. Then the tail shuts down, all semblance of a bird is lost, and one can see nothing but a ball of feathers.—London Standard.

THE BLACK DIAMOND

It Is One of the Curiosities of the Mineral Kingdom.

A PUZZLE TO SCIENTISTS.

Nature Has In Some Peculiar Way Produced This Rare Form of Carbon and Then Thrown Away the Secret of the Process—Found Only In Brazil.

The term "black diamonds" is sometimes jokingly applied to ordinary coal which we burn in our furnaces, but the real "black diamonds" of commerce are among the most unique mineral products of the world, and they serve a purpose in the industrial world that makes them of great value. The black diamonds are pure carbon and yet in no outward appearance resemble the diamonds which we are accustomed to wear as ornaments. They are slightly harder than the crystal or gem diamonds and, in fact, about the hardest substance known.

Black diamonds, or carbons, are among the greatest curiosities of the mineral kingdom. They are without crystalline form and are found in irregular pieces, ranging in size from half a carat up to three, four and five hundred carats. They are dark gray, black or brownish in color and opaque. The real diamond of the jewelry trade is also pure carbon, but translucent and crystalline in form. Two objects so alike in composition could not be found so opposite in appearance as these two forms of carbon.

Another peculiar thing about the black diamonds is that they are found only in one locality in the world. They come from a very small section of Brazil not more than 225 miles square in area. Outside of this limited territory no pure black diamonds have ever been found.

What peculiar freak of nature caused the deposition of the black diamonds in this section of the world and nowhere else is one of the mysteries which science has failed to explain. None of them has been found in the great Kimberley diamond regions, where the crystal form of diamonds have for so long been mined.

The whole origin of the black diamond is, therefore, a scientific enigma. Naturally the question is raised, "Of what use is a black diamond?" No one would care to wear one of these diamonds, which resembles a piece of coal more than a real diamond, and so far no one has popularized the black gems as the black pearl has been. Nevertheless the black diamonds serve a most important and useful function in the industrial world.

This pure black carbon is not only harder than the real diamond, but tougher and not so brittle as the gem. Consequently it is of great value for many mechanical purposes and particularly for boring with diamond drills. In diamond drilling the tips of the drills are studded with carbon, or black diamonds, and when the bores are deep the pressure is so great that the gem diamonds would be crushed in the process. But the carbon resists this continued pressure and slowly eats down into the rocks.

In diamond drill work the carbon is set in circular pieces of soft steel or iron, called bits, and these bits are attached to tubing. Armed with these black diamond teeth, the drills push their way down under severe pressure to a depth of five and six thousand feet, cutting through the hardest kind of rock. Some black diamonds are much harder than others, and there is no way to determine by the color the difference in the degree of toughness.

Black diamonds or pure carbon are not by any means cheap, and the owners of the mines in Brazil where they are gathered are making a good thing out of their monopoly. There is no known substance that can take the place of carbon in drills in boring for gold, silver, copper and other mineral deposits. Before the black diamonds of Brazil were discovered it was impossible to make borings.

When the carbon was first introduced in our industries it was used in diamond saws for cutting stones marble and similar substances. Then the price advanced so that the carbon was found too costly for such use, and bort was substituted for stone cutting. Bort is really an imperfect crystal or gem diamond, but it is too brittle for use in drills. Consequently bort has taken the place of black diamonds for stone cutting, and the latter have been restricted almost entirely to diamond drilling purposes.

The average size of black diamonds used in the drills ranges from two to five carats, but the larger specimens give much better results. They cost more, but they last longer. Consequently there is a greater demand for the larger pieces of pure carbon, and the price is sometimes run up to premium figures for unusual specimens.

The fear that the supply of black diamonds may some day give out and paralyze the diamond drilling industry has stimulated prospectors to systematic search for new deposits, but so far they have not been successful. On the other hand, scientists have been making a close study of the chemical conditions which have produced the black diamonds, but their manufacture is apparently about as difficult as the making of the gem diamonds. It is possible under certain conditions to make either, but not in sizes sufficient to be of any commercial value. Nature in some peculiar way has made these rare products and then thrown the secret of the process away. If any man can ever unlock or find that secret he may cause a panic in the diamond trade.—Scientific American.

WASHING DISHES.

Only One Time In a Woman's Life When She Enjoys It.

We never knew but one woman who professed that she liked to wash dishes, and from that moment our faith in her veracity melted like soap in hot dishwater.

The only time we wish we were a man is after a hearty dinner, when he can enjoy a siesta or discuss the papers, while we must attend to the inevitable dishes.

Can any one wonder that girls get tired of the monotonous round of dishwashing, which must be done three times a day for the 365 consecutive days?

Think of it, ye gods, and tear your hair and weep for the woes of our sisterhood!

There is a short time in most every woman's life when it is a pleasure, but that is when we are too small to reach upon the kitchen table without a chair and are permitted to wash the cups and saucers to keep us out of mischief. When we are older and have it to do alone the soup tureen would not hold the tears we shed over it.

How we have dreamed over the blue pictures on the old fashioned dishes—pictures of impossible temples and castles, built in unhealthy proximity to "clear lakes," and in girlish fancy wandered to unheard of lands to dwell in those "castles in the air."

There should be no dishwashing there.

But hark! The shrill voice of our mother rings out clear and sharp:

"Matilda, what are you doing?" with rising inflection on the last syllable of our name.

All the house knows that "Till" is dreaming over the dishpan again, and reverie is not permitted in our active household, which was conducted on the "whoop her up" system.

When we see ladies going mad over ceramics we wonder if they served their apprenticeship polishing tablefuls of china.—New York Weekly.

A DREAM CAT.

Repeated Appearance Premonitory of Disease.

"Some years ago, early in the summer," says H. Addington Bruce in Success Magazine, "I dreamed that while out taking a walk I was suddenly attacked by a huge cat, which clawed ferociously at my throat. That was all there was to the dream, or, at any rate, that was all I remembered on awakening in the morning, and, naturally enough, I dismissed it from my mind as nothing but a dream.

"But when I found myself dreaming the same dream again and again I began to wonder what significance it would possibly have. Usually it varied greatly in minor detail. Always, however, the climax was the same—the cat had me by the throat and was biting and scratching viciously. Altogether I dreamed this dream not less than a score of times in six months.

"Shortly before Christmas I took a cold, which settled in my throat, affecting it so badly as to require the attention of a specialist. Much to my astonishment, it was then discovered that a growth had been developing for some time and that an immediate operation was necessary.

"Several weeks later, the operation having been performed successfully, it suddenly occurred to me that I was no longer being troubled by the phantom cat. For the first time the meaning of the singular dream dawned upon me.

"It had been a genuine premonitory dream. Consciously I had been in utter ignorance of the dangerous growth in my throat. It had not progressed far enough to give me any pain or even to cause discomfort. At the same time the organic changes it involved had produced sensations plainly felt by what psychologists call the subconscious and, manifesting through the subconscious to the conscious in the form of a symbolic dream."

No Port In a Storm.

The most dangerous of all places when a thunderstorm rages is probably a powder house; consequently it is a rule in explosive works that all the workers shall leave their "house" at the approach of a thunderstorm. So far all is well. But very often when the thunderstorm has passed and the men return and open the cake presses severe explosions have occurred. The reason of these accidents is that in the process of manufacture black powder is placed in the cake presses in alternate layers of powder and ebonite. This acts as an electric pile, just like the pile of coppers and disks of zinc with which boys amuse themselves. When the pile is disturbed the electricity "sparks," and up go building, workers and all.—London Answers.

How a Moose Eats.

Of all peculiar sights I think that that of a moose eating grass is the most extraordinary. The neck is so short and the legs are so long that the animal usually kneels in eating grass. True, it does not attempt it very often, for grass is by no means a staple with it, but even a moose likes a change of diet. The appearance of this huge and awkward creature in this devotional attitude is not only interesting, but laughable.—St. Nicholas.

There was no school on Monday as the scholars would have found it almost an impossibility to get to the school house, while the school marm, with a number of others from this town, put in the day returning home from the Kratka ball.

That was quite a smart looking bachelor, said an elderly lady to her dughter, in one of our country stores, a short time ago. Yes said the younger one, "but how do you know he was bachelor ma?" "By the pancake dough on his overalls," was the reply.

The board of directors of the farmers boat company met at Kratka last Saturday evening, but could do nothing to stop the sale of the boat, in fact there is nothing to do, unless we could raise about a $1000, cash. How much will you give Mister?

All who attended the ball at Kratka last Saturday night had a fine time, until it came time to go home in the morning Among those who went down from this town on the Dan Patch, were the two Miss Seters, Mr. Ness, Mr. George Beaudry, Miss Christine Skore, Mr. Alfred Swanson, and two young ladies from Hilda.

We have not time to set many locals this week, as it has taken us about all the week to all got home from Kratka, where we attended the dance last Saturday night. We got home Sunday night, but we left our buggy at one place, the harness at an other place and the horse at another place, while the dog got lost in shuffle, and it took until Wednesday evening to get all home.

Walter McAndress, Mike Kolski and ye editor put in an hour of lively work diging our way through the snow and ice to get across the river at Jim O'Briens place, in a boat on Sunday. We got near enough to the shore at last so Jim could throw a rope to us which he did, aad then give us a good warm dinner and lift toward home with his team.

Wallack on the Ballet.

The late Lester Wallack once told a story of his still more famous father, James W., that as either an actor or a manager he could never tolerate the ballet, even where it was seemingly necessary according to custom as part of an entertainment or in the opera.

One day there came to him a friend, a man about town, who said, "My dear Wallack, it is very curious that you do not see the beauties of imagination shown by the poses of the ballet." Going on in this strain, the visitor at last wore out the patience of the actor-manager, who replied:

"Look here, it is bad enough to stand these absurdities in an opera, but, though I can comprehend people singing their joys, I am hanged if I can stand their dancing their griefs."

The Canny Scot.

In the differences that would sometimes arise between members of his tenantry the Duke of Argyll was often invited to arbitrate upon the matter in dispute, and he used to tell a characteristically Scottish story of one of the occasions. Two tenants having waited upon him and asked him to decide the question at issue, the duke put what he always regarded as a very necessary preliminary question. "Will you abide by my award?"

"Well, your grace," was the reply of one of the hard headed old disputants, "I'd like to ken first what it is."—London Chronicle.

The Other Way With Him.

"Remember, sir, that you owe something to your constituents," said one member of a town council to another.

"Humph!" said the other. "If you owe anything to your constituents all I've got to say is that you're lucky. Why, there are not half a dozen voters in my ward that have not borrowed money from me."—Stray Stories.

THE CENTURY PLANT.

It Blooms, Says a Florist, Every Twenty-five to Forty Years.

"The regular century plant," said an expert in floriculture, "is not a cactus. It belongs to a family by itself. It has a large, broad leaf, sometimes two or three feet long and several inches thick where they branch from the center. There are two varieties, one the variegated and the other green. The only difference is that the variegated has a white stripe along the outer edge of the leaf. Both bloom every twenty-five to forty years. A stock perhaps eight or ten inches in diameter shoots up from the center to a height of fifteen or twenty feet, and around this stock cluster small blossoms. They are neither pretty nor fragrant. They were formerly supposed to bloom once in a hundred years.

"The nearest thing to a century plant is a night blooming cereus It is a cactus and blooms once in about every twenty-five years or so. The flower is large, very beautiful and has a delightful odor. One plant may have several blossoms, but each flower lasts only one night.

"There is no such plant as a 'century cactus.' The cactuses that many have mistaken for 'century cactuses' will bloom in four or five years if kept under glass or about seven years if not in a hothouse. Because they are so long in blooming, I suppose, they have been called 'century cactuses,' and the name has been handed down until it is considered the proper term for them. They bloom yearly after the first blossoms appear. They are just an ordinary cactus, but they have a pretty, fragrant flower."—Seattle Times.

The Judge's Advice.

In sentencing a forger of banknotes to death an English judge said, "I can hold out no hope to you for mercy here, and I must urge you to make preparation for another world, where I hope you may obtain that mercy which a due regard to the credit of our paper currency forbids you to hope for here."

How He Paid His Fine.

Pat Kelly, the owner of the only jaunting car in the village, went on a spree and was sentenced to a fine of 20 shillings or seven days in jail. Kelly chose the latter.

Now, the prison was ten miles away, and the only possible means of getting a prisoner there was by driving. As Kelly himself had the only car in the place, there was nothing to do but to hire it. For some time the constable and his prisoner haggled over the terms.

Kelly stuck out firmly for 30 shillings, to be paid in advance and at last the constable had to consent to the extortion. Accordingly they drove off and without any misadventures arrived at the prison. When they had alighted Kelly suddenly informed his companion that he had changed his mind, as the prison wasn't a decent looking place, and would pay the fine.

He thereupon drew out the 30 shillings he had received, counted out the 20 shillings and paid them over to the inspector. Then, jumping on his car, he drove away, leaving the constable to walk back.

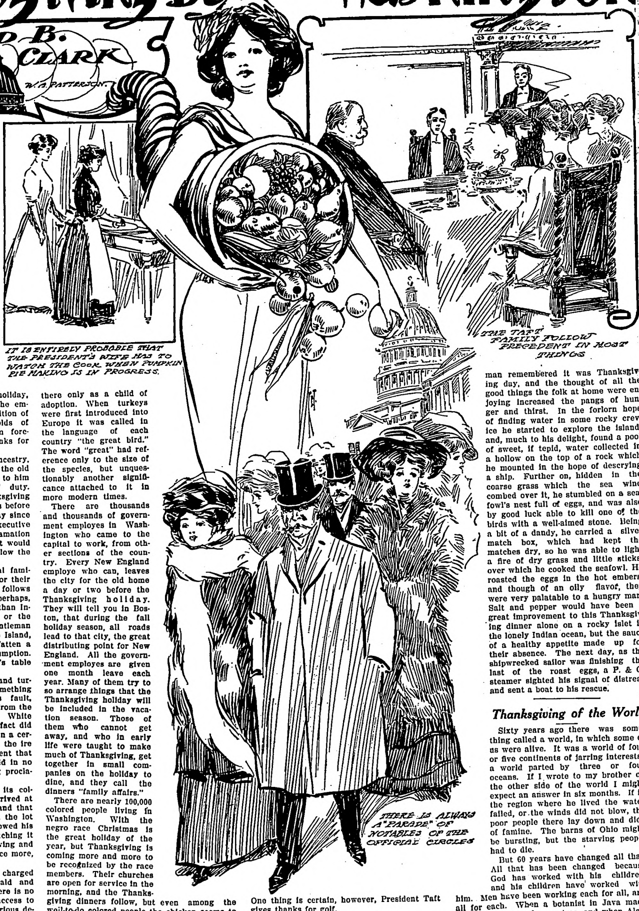
Thanksgiving Day in Washington

by EDWARD B. CLARK

COPYRIGHT BY W.A. PATTERSON



IT IS ENTIRELY PROBABLE THAT THE PRESIDENT'S WIFE HAS TO WATCH THE COOK WHEN PUMPKIN PIE MAKING IS IN PROGRESS.

THE TAFT FAMILY FOLLOW PRECEDENT IN MOST THINGS

THERE IS ALWAYS A "PARADE" OF NOTABLES OF THE OFFICIAL CIRCLES

FROM Washington every year goes forth a presidential proclamation calling on the people of the United States to give thanks on the last Thursday in November for the blessings of prosperity and progress, and if there have been no prosperity and progress, to give thanks that things have been no worse, and that matters probably will be better in the future.

While the capital is the headquarters, so to speak, of these Thanksgiving proclamations, Thanksgiving day itself is not one of the great holidays of the year on the banks of the Potomac, although it is recognized and celebrated where recognition and celebration are given it at all, in a manner that does not hold in other sections of the country.

The foreigners connected with the different legations look on Thanksgiving as being peculiarly an American holiday, and it is the truth that at some of the embassies there is a more marked recognition of the day than there is in the households of Washington Americans whose Pilgrim forefathers set the example of giving thanks for the harvest home.

President Taft is of New England ancestry, and the celebration of Thanksgiving in the old and approved style of New England is to him not only a matter of pleasure, but of duty. The president goes to church on Thanksgiving day morning just as all other presidents before him have gone to church on the holiday since custom established it that the chief executive should urge the people in public proclamation to get together for praise offerings. It would not do for a president to decline to follow the advice that he has given the people.

For a great many years presidential families have eaten Rhode Island turkeys for their Thanksgiving dinner. The Taft family follows precedent in most things. It isn't, perhaps, that Rhode Island turkeys are better than Indiana turkeys, or Oklahoma turkeys, or the turkeys of any other state, but a gentleman named Vose, who lives down in Rhode Island, has made it a practice for years to fatten a special turkey for White House consumption. The bird that goes to the president's table never weighs less than 25 pounds.

About five years ago the Rhode Island turkey gift to the White House caused something of a sensation. It was not the bird's fault, however. Before the turkey is shipped from the Rhode Island breeding ground to the White House, it is killed and plucked. This fact did not prevent the publication of a story in a certain newspaper, a story which aroused the ire of President Roosevelt to such an extent that he issued a warm statement that could in no wise be called a second Thanksgiving proclamation.

An eastern newspaper declared in its columns that the Rhode Island turkey arrived at the White House, alive and kicking, and that Theodore Roosevelt turned it loose in the lot back of the executive mansion and allowed his children to run the bird to death, catching it now and then, and plucking from it, wing and tail feathers, only to loose the bird once more, and to go on again with the chase.

This story of cruelty to animals charged against himself and Kermit, Archibald and Quentin made the president mad. There is no other word to be used. He forbade access to the White House offices and to the various departments of government to the correspondents of the offending paper. How the story originated, no one ever knew, for the turkey was dead and cold long before it left its native turkey yard. It is supposed that some one told it as a joke and that the newspaper correspondent took it seriously. At any rate, one Thanksgiving turkey some days after it had passed from life gave the country something to talk about for a week.

The White House Thanksgiving dinner is like the Thanksgiving dinner in the homes of most good Americans who are able to buy a dinner of holiday proportions. The president, his wife and children, eat roast turkey with stuffing, cranberry sauce, mashed potatoes and other vegetables, and wind up with pumpkin pie

It is entirely probable that the president's wife has to watch the cook when the pumpkin pie making is in progress, and be especially watchful if the cook was born and raised in Washington. There is a firm conviction in the minds of all District of Columbia people that a squash and a pumpkin are the same thing. Ask for pumpkin pie in a Washington restaurant and they give you squash pie, and if you are courageous enough to protest, you will be told that there is no difference between squash and pumpkin, and the information will be given you with an air of pity for benighted ignorance. The wise Washingtonian who has gone to the capital from other sections, invariably imports his own pumpkins, for if one is ordered from the market man a squash invariably turns up in the kitchen. The New Englander holds that no Thanksgiving dinner is complete without the pumpkin pie. President Taft knows a pumpkin when he sees it.

It has been said that the foreigners, the ambassadors, the envoys extraordinary, the ministers plenipotentiary and all the attaches of the different legations, give heed to Thanksgiving day. An American secretary of state who hailed from New England once said that the foreigners rejoiced in Thanksgiving because it gave them a chance to eat all the turkey that they wanted to without feeling that they were called on to give an excuse for over-feeding. The foreigners love turkey. It is the one simon-pure American institution to which they have sworn allegiance. The turkey is an American bird and while it is found in Europe, it is there only as a child of adoption. When turkeys were first introduced into Europe it was called in the language of each country "the great bird." The word "great" had reference only to the size of the species, but unquestionably another significance attached to it in more modern times.

There are thousands and thousands of government employes in Washington who came to the capital to work, from other sections of the country. Every New England employe who can, leaves the city for the old home a day or two before the Thanksgiving holiday. They will tell you in Boston, that during the fall holiday season, all roads lead to that city, the great distributing point for New England. All the government employes are given one month leave each year. Many of them try to so arrange things that the Thanksgiving holiday will be included in the vacation season. Those of them who cannot get away, and who in early life were taught to make much of Thanksgiving, get together in small companies on the holiday to dine, and they call the dinners "family affairs."

There are nearly 100,000 colored people living in Washington. With the negro race Christmas is the great holiday of the year, but Thanksgiving is coming more and more to be recognized by the race members. Their churches are open for service in the morning, and the Thanksgiving dinners follow, but even among the well-to-do colored people the chicken seems to be preferred to the turkey, and not infrequently the 'possum is preferred to both.

Thanksgiving time in Washington is still a beautiful season. The leaves on many of the trees still cling, and they retain their touch of autumn color. Roses are in bloom in many sheltered places, and flowers of other kinds are not infrequent in the "out-of-doors." In fact, there is only about one month of the Washington year in which one cannot pick some species of flower in the open. In ordinary seasons the last of the roses drop from the stem about Christmas day.

On Connecticut avenue on Thanksgiving day there is always a "parade" of the notables of the official circles. Connecticut avenue is one of the fashionable thoroughfares of the capital city, and on Sundays and holidays the sidewalks are crowded with people. On Thanksgiving day morning, if it is pleasant, one can get fairly adequate knowledge of the winter fashions from a stroll down the avenue, for on that day the women of society put on for the first time, their cold weather garb. The Connecticut avenue "parade" is a Washington institution.

Just about a week after Thanksgiving, congress opens. Most of the members stay at home for the holiday, and then comes the rush to the capital. The president hails Thanksgiving day as one of rest from his message writing labor. A president's message always is long and in some parts it is of necessity, dull, for it must deal with things which confessedly have no live interest excepting to the statistician. President Taft is not as fond of writing messages as was President Roosevelt, and it is entirely probable that there is a real thanksgiving in the present president's heart over the fact that on one day he has ample excuse to drop his pen.

There are a great many golf clubs in the District of Columbia. They play golf all winter long in this latitude, and President Taft never misses an opportunity to go out on the links. Thanksgiving afternoon every Washingtonian who can, and who knows how to play the game, starts for the club house. The president is a member of several golf clubs, but it may be of interest to the American people to know that he seldom plays on the grounds of the club which is considered the most fashionable and exclusive in the country's capital. One thing is certain, however, President Taft gives thanks for golf.

Over at Fort Myer, across the Potomac, the soldiers celebrate Thanksgiving with football and a big dinner. The fall festival is celebrated at every army post in the United States, and is celebrated royally. The commissary puts forth of its best, and the dinner is even better than that given the soldiers on Christmas day. Perhaps the reason is that the proper observance of Thanksgiving day is regarded in the light of an order from the commander-in-chief. The Thanksgiving proclamation has the same binding effect on the army and navy as an order for the two arms of the service to go forth to fight.

It should not be forgotten, perhaps, that one great cause for Thanksgiving this year at the White House dinner table is that William Howard Taft has returned unscathed from the longest presidential journey ever undertaken.

A Lonely Thanksgiving

Some years ago a sailing ship bound from New York to Singapore with oil, took fire in the middle of the Indian ocean the day before Thanksgiving. Realizing that it was impossible to extinguish the burning oil, the captain ordered the men to the boats, with such provisions as they could carry at short notice. The long-boat, containing the captain, second mate and ten men, got away all right, but was never heard of again. The cutter, with the first mate and the rest of the crew, after drifting about in the darkness for several hours, went broadside against a coral reef and was smashed like an eggshell. The mate alone succeeded in reaching land, all the others being dashed to death on the jagged reef-points or drowned in the boiling surf.

Daylight showed the survivor that he was marooned on a little island that was not much more than a cluster of rocks rising above the waves. It was a half mile wide at the widest part and about a mile in circumference, and was surrounded by a bristling chevaux de frise of reefs, over which the billows spouted in foam and thunder. Beyond the glittering walls of spray was the desolate expanse of the Indian ocean, with not a sail or a smudge of smoke anywhere in sight. The shipwrecked man remembered it was Thanksgiving day, and the thought of all the good things the folk at home were enjoying increased the pangs of hunger and thirst. In the forlorn hope of finding water in some rocky crevice he started to explore the island, and, much to his delight, found a pool of sweet, if tepid, water collected in a hollow on the top of a rock which he mounted in the hope of descrying a ship. Further on, hidden in the coarse grass which the sea wind combed over it, he stumbled on a seafowl's nest full of eggs, and was also by good luck able to kill one of the birds with a well-aimed stone. Being a bit of a dandy, he carried a silver match box, which had kept the matches dry, so he was able to light a fire of dry grass and little sticks, over which he cooked the seafowl. He roasted the eggs in the hot embers, and though of an oily flavor, they were very palatable to a hungry man. Salt and pepper would have been a great improvement to this Thanksgiving dinner alone on a rocky islet in the lonely Indian ocean, but the sauce of a healthy appetite made up for their absence. The next day, as the shipwrecked sailor was finishing the last of the roast eggs, a P. & O. steamer sighted his signal of distress and sent a boat to his rescue.

Thanksgiving of the World

Sixty years ago there was something called a world, in which some of us were alive. It was a world of four or five continents of jarring interests; a world parted by three or four oceans. If I wrote to my brother on the other side of the world I might expect an answer in six months. If in the region where he lived the water failed, or the winds did not blow, the poor people there lay down and died of famine. The barns of Ohio might be bursting, but the starving people had to die.

But 60 years have changed all that. All that has been changed because God has worked with his children, and his children have worked with him. Men have been working each for all, and all for each. When a botanist in Java made gutta percha flow from a tree, and when Alexander Agassiz and the rest compelled the Lake Superior mines to deliver their copper, some hundreds of thousands of God's children between them drew the copper into wire and sheathed it with gutta percha and laid their cable beneath the oceans. The children worked with their Father, and the Father worked with his children. It is not one man who has done this. It is not a hundred men. It is the union of the world. It is this union of the children with the Father, and the Father with the children. The great victories have been the victories which you and I have prayed for every morning when we have wished that the Father's will may be done on earth just as it is done in heaven.

All for each, and each for all!—Edward Everett Hale, in Woman's Home Companion.

The Habit of Thankfulness

We are creatures of habit and our habits express our characters.

Too many people have formed the habit of chronic grumbling. Nothing suits them. No matter how beautiful the weather, they could improve it. They may be enjoying the very best of health, but they will not admit it. They are eternally predicting disaster. They are chronic grumblers:

They grumble at board, they grumble in bed,
From the soles of their feet to the crown of their head.

Such a spirit is a crime in this world and age. This is a beautiful world. This is the best age of history. Every 24 hours the sun is shining upon a better, brighter, happier earth. "We are the heirs of all the ages in the foremost files of times."

We are living, we are dwelling in a grand and awful time
In an age on ages telling, to be living is sublime.

It is just as easy and infinitely better to cultivate the cheerful, thankful spirit. Gratitude should be the habit of every life. To look on the bright side, to carry sunshine in the heart and reflect it in speech and conduct is to enjoy life and make it a blessing to the world

OWES HER LIFE TO

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Vienna, W. Va.—"I feel that I owe the last ten years of my life to Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Eleven years ago I was a walking shadow. I had been under the doctor's care but got no relief. My husband persuaded me to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and it worked like a charm. It relieved all my pains and misery. I advise all suffering women to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound."—MRS. EMMA WHEATON, Vienna, W. Va.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, made from native roots and herbs, contains no narcotics or harmful drugs, and to-day holds the record for the largest number of actual cures of female diseases of any similar medicine in the country, and thousands of voluntary testimonials are on file in the Pinkham laboratory at Lynn, Mass., from women who have been cured from almost every form of female complaints, inflammation, ulceration, displacements, fibroid tumors, irregularities, periodic pains, backache, indigestion and nervous prostration. Every such suffering woman owes it to herself to give Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a trial.

If you would like special advice about your case write a confidential letter to Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass. Her advice is free, and always helpful.

A Surprising Legacy

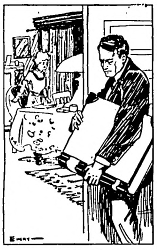
By GEORGE T. PARDY

(Copyright, by W. G. Chapman.)

When Rev. Arthur Hamilton passed over to the great majority Mrs. Hamilton and her only son forsook the little New England village that had been their home for many happy years, and went to New York. The widow's principal reason for selecting the metropolis as the scene of their future fortunes was that Alexander Hamilton, her husband's brother, dwelt therein, and she hoped to benefit by his advice and assistance.

Alex Hamilton was a rich old bachelor, full of whims and caprices, and one of whose great hobbies was that of collecting interesting extracts from the current newspapers. No visitor was so welcome as he who would draw from his pocket strips of newspapers bearing on the favorite topic for the time being. Their eccentric relative received the widow and her son pleasantly enough, but in a rather matter-of-fact way. He advised them to look for inexpensive lodgings, said that Alfred must try to find something to do in the city, requested the lad to pay him a weekly visit, and stated that he would be expected to bring with him any contributions cut from the daily papers which he thought would be of interest to his uncle.

Many weeks passed. The mother and son would have been lonesome, cruelly so, had they not met a friend, a former resident of their own New England village, who with his daughter Kate was almost their neighbor once more, having lodgings in an adjacent street. Alfred applied, but unsuccessfully, for every situation advertised in the papers for which he thought himself suited. It was a period of bitter disappointment and weary waiting. When he visited his uncle the old man would greet him with:



Alfred Produced the Ponderous Volume.

"Well, my boy, have you found anything to suit you in the papers yet?" And when Alfred despondingly answered in the negative, the only comment would be: "Well, we must all bide our time, and yours is bound to come some day, lad." As a matter of fact, the old gentleman appeared to take more interest in the newspaper scraps which Alfred brought him than in the present prospects of his nephew.

Thus the weeks passed away, and poor Alfred returned nightly to his mother, weary in body, and discouraged in mind. "I have found nothing as yet, mother," said he, one evening, "and to-morrow is Sunday, when I must again pay Uncle Alex my duty visit. If he only invited you to dinner occasionally, I could humor his newspaper fad and contribute to it more willingly."

"We can only be patient, Alf," said his mother, quietly.

"I guess nobody can find fault with us on that score," responded her son, ruefully. "Have you seen Kate today, mother?"

"Yes, she came in for a moment on her way back from the workroom. Ah, Alfred, I never thought that you would wish to marry the forewoman of a dressmaker's shop!"

"Mother, you should not speak in that way," returned her son. "You know how good and honest and true Kate is, and how much we love each other. Is it not better that she should work than be idle and dependent on her old father? When we are able to marry, think what a good daughter you will have."

"Ay, when you are able!" sighed Mrs. Hamilton, drearily.

At length Mr. Alexander Hamilton died quite suddenly and unexpectedly, and very anxious and uncertain were his numerous relatives. So numerous were these latter folk—for cousins of the fourth and sixth degree even cropped up on the day of the old gentleman's funeral—that his large dining-room could scarcely accommodate his would-be heirs.

After the last ceremony had been performed, the lawyer proceeded to read aloud the "last will and testament of Alexander Hamilton." To each and all there was some token of remembrance, but no large sum to any individual. The last sentence which the will contained read as follows:

"And I give and bequeath to my nephew, Alfred Hamilton, my large bound volume of newspaper cuttings, the said Alfred Hamilton having by his patient industry contributed more than any other relative to the forming of this collection."

It was a severe blow to Mrs. Hamilton and the lovers. Their visions of a snug little house in the suburbs to take the place of their present lodgings had vanished into thin air. Gone also was Alfred's hope of an early marriage with Kate. Working and waiting must still be their portion.

One by one the guests departed, and as Alfred and his mother were taking their leave of the lawyer, that gentleman thrust a huge volume into the young fellow's hands. "You had better take your legacy with you," he said, smiling.

Alfred looked with disgust at the thick, ponderous book, bound in leather, and garnished with strong, brass clasps.

"I suppose I must take it," he said, and tucked it under his arm. On reaching home he flung it into a closet where his mother kept various odds and ends of furniture. Alfred and Kate remained faithful to each other, and at least had the pleasure of spending their evenings together. On one of these occasions Kate exclaimed:

"Bring your legacy out, Alf, and let us look at it. We have recovered from our disappointment enough now to be able to view it calmly."

Alfred laughed, and having dived into the dark corners of the closet, produced the ponderous volume, which had mocked their bright expectations. "If you only knew the time I wasted on that thing," he said, regarding the book venomously, "you wouldn't blame me if I was to throw it in the fire."

"Put it on the table and let me look through it, for you know it is new to me," said Kate. Slowly she turned the thick, heavy leaves; there were newspaper clippings, and nothing but clippings on each side of the page.

Suddenly the girl exclaimed. "See here, Alf, these two leaves are gummed together, and so are these. Why, the leaves in the middle of the book seem to be all gummed together!"

With her slender fingers she deftly separated leaf from leaf. Between the first and second the onlookers perceived something that brought forth a universal cry of surprise. It was a $100 bill, carefully placed in the center. The third and fourth pages were opened with a similar result, and all through the following leaves were discovered bills of a like denomination, until the total sum came to $20,000.

"And to think that it was reserved for Kate to find our fortune!" cried Alfred, exultingly, as soon as they had recovered from their astonishment. "I guess we'll move into that little house in the suburbs without much further delay, won't we, dearie?"

"As soon as ever you please, Alf," said the girl, as he stooped and kissed her.

The Thirsty Pup.

Crowds along Chestnut street were very much amused the other day by a small mongrel pup that was following a sprinkling wagon with his parched tongue hanging from his mouth, and barking at almost every step.

It was some time before the driver noticed him, despite the barking, and a still longer time before he realized that the dog wanted a drink. He did wake up to the fact at last, however, and, placing his foot on the lever that controls the flow of water, allowed a tiny stream to run out. The dog opened his mouth and let the water drop into it.

It was this that attracted the crowd, for the dog followed the wagon in that position for two squares before his thirst was satisfied.—Philadelphia Times.

Repulsive Eskimo Diet.

Scurvy, so common and deadly among early polar explorers, is totally unknown among Eskimos who eat raw meat. This iodized raw food also explains the absence of enlarged tonsils, glands and goiter. Their perfect, splendid teeth and strong lower jaws mark them completely carnivorous. The exclusion of vegetable food has shortened their intestine, and indigestion is unknown. One would suppose their pure flesh diet would cause biliousness, etc., but the large percentage of oil in their food acts as a gentle laxative and protects against all harms. The Eskimo eats with relish old rotten blubber that would stagger a buzzard.—New York Press.

An Incendiary Lover.

A blaze was discovered in a Williamsburg letter box and the contents, about 50 letters, were charred before the fire was extinguished. It is the opinion of the police that a young man wrote a proposal of marriage to his girl and then got cold feet and set the boxful of letters on fire to destroy his own. It was George Ade who wrote this caution to young men, "Tell 'em anything you want, but don't write letters."—Boston Globe.

A GREAT ANNOYANCE.

Kidney Disease Shows Many Painful and Unpleasant Symptoms.

George S. Crowell, 1109 Broadway, Helena, Mont., says: "I was troubled with a disordered condition of the kidneys, some backache and irregular passages of secretions. At times I was obliged to get up out of bed at night, and the urine was unnatural in appearance. On the advice of a friend I procured Doan's Kidney Pills and began using them. This remedy helped me at once, strengthened my kidneys and corrected the disordered condition."

Two Little Girls Had Eczema Very Badly—In One Case Child's Hair Came Out and Left Bare Patches.

Cuticura Met with Great Success.

"I have two little girls who have been troubled very badly with eczema. One of them had it on her lower limbs. I did everything that I could hear of for her, but it did not give in until warm weather, when it seemingly subsided. The next winter when it became cold the eczema started again and also in her head where it would take the hair out and leave bare patches. At the same time her arms were sore the whole length of them. I took her to a physician, but the child grew worse all the time. Her sister's arms were also affected. I began using Cuticura Remedies, and by the time the second lot was used their skin was soft and smooth. Mrs. Charles Baker, Albion, Me., Sept. 21, '08."

A Lay Matter.

"Would you like the floors in mosaic?" asked the architect.

The Springfield man looked dubious.

"Would you like the floors in mosaic patterns?"

"I don't know so much about that," he finally said. "I ain't got any prejudice against Moses as a man, and maybe he knew a lot about the law. As regards laying of floors, though, I kinder think I'd rather have 'em unsectarian."—Harper's Weekly.

Deafness Cannot Be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

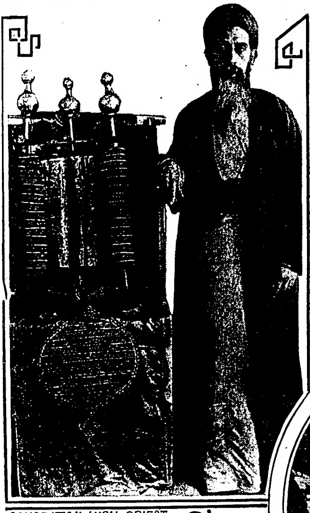
THANKSGIVING in the HOLY LAND

CELEBRATED BY QUAINT AND ANCIENT CUSTOMS

THE average American has an idea that Thanksgiving is a national holiday peculiar to his country and celebrated because of proclamations issued by the president and by governors of states, whereas the feast of Thanksgiving is observed in many other countries. One of the many interesting observances of this feast is held by the Jews in Jerusalem, though it is celebrated in a very different manner from that we are accustomed to think of as Thanksgiving.

While we here celebrate the day by discontinuing all business and giving up ourselves mostly to the Thanksgiving dinner, in the far east the Thanksgiving is combined as a religious service for several days, though accompanied by much merry-making, during which all business is suspended. The ancient Hebrew people, who were once the owners of this land, promised to them for centuries; owners of its fertile fields, its prosperous cities—and alone all of its sacred sites—the most beloved of all being the beautiful temple built by King Solomon, are now strangers in their own land, admitted on to its sacred soil only with reluctance by the masterful Turk.



SAMARITAN HIGH PRIEST

Clinging to the memory of their glorious past, drawn near to each other because of their common love for their peculiar traditions and for their "Torah"—their solace through the ages—they gather in colonies as near as possible to sites theirs by right through inheritance, though not granted them by the usurpers of their land. Driven through the centuries from country to country, persecuted for their religion and massacred by the injustice of racial prejudice, they now flock to their own country, selling all they possess to pay the voyage and come to look upon the land where lived their patriarchs and prophets and to die and be buried on holy soil.

When once the Turk has let them enter in his port he is a friend to them up to a certain limit. But, alas! Their most sacred sites are all in his zealous care, and the keys are held in his tightly closed hands so that the places they crave most to gaze upon are forbidden ground to them. They can only stand without and weep.

Sorrowfully they gather as near as they are permitted to the old wall of their beloved temple. Notwithstanding his gray hairs and bowed figure, his sad face filled with the woes of a sorrowful people, and eyes which speak of the suffering of centuries, the Hebrew is mocked and jeered if he ventures too near to sites which the deeds of his ancestors made glorious and memorable to all the world. Though if he respects these boundaries set by the infidel and is content to worship his God upon such space as is allotted to him he has perfect freedom and religious liberty.

The three greatest feasts in which the Jew remembers his past and fulfills in all the details possible the old Mosaic law in the land promised to Moses so many centuries ago are the Passover, Tabernacles and Pentecost. It is at the feast of Passover that he feels most keenly the fact that he is a stranger in his native land and rebels and groans at the Turkish rule—for he can no longer offer the paschal sacrifice in the temple on Mt. Zion—for upon its site stands a gorgeous mosque, where only Islam bends the knee and bows the head in adoration to Allah and Mohammed. Yet there are times when the Jew in his own ancient land rejoices and is glad.

With thanks to his God for the existence to-day of his race—still set apart—and with great festivity he commemorates God's wonderful preservation of this people and celebrates the remarkable events in their history. He is elated at the privilege of being able to celebrate his own feasts in the place where they were instituted and this is entirely possible at the feast of Thanksgiving, for it is a festival for the synagogue and the home and there are no obstacles in the Holy Land to the fulfilling of every letter of the law in regard to this celebration. Setting care and business aside, he dons his handsomest gown and goes to the synagogue, which has also been decorated in festive attire, and with a thankful heart he enters into a service which is all joyousness.

The principal feature of this feast of Thanksgiving is the dwelling in "tabernacles," or booths, for seven days. Under a perfect blue sky, surrounded by these eternal "hills round about Jerusalem," amid ancient olive trees, or in desolate, stony fields of ruin, stand the little Jewish colonies—and by each house its little "succa" for celebrating the feast. Each colony has its own synagogue and here the rabbi leads the congregation in the songs of thanksgiving, while the women prepare the festive meal to be served within the green booth. Here the family will meet in deep happiness, because they have been able to fulfill the command of Moses, their "lawgiver," once again—and in the Holy Land.

The feast of Thanksgiving commemorates God's goodness in the past to the Israelites in the wilderness. Their long wandering in the journey to the promised land is symbolized by their residence by day in these booths for the space of a week. This festival is also called the feast of Ingathering. This thought is illustrated by the plants in the "succa" and by the branch with which it is built; also by the palms and willows and lemons which are brought into the synagogue and rejoiced over.

All the services are exceedingly picturesque and all the customs are surrounded by symbolical tokens and figurative acts and parabolic speech. For this ancient people belong to a past age, when man clung to symbols, and to an oriental clime, where all speech is flowery and filled with imagery. In this land, sacred by its wonderful history, mystic by its strange traditions, ancient because the birthplace of venerable religions, where the city walls inclose beloved ruins and the barren, stony hills speak sorrowfully of what has been and is no more, there is something peculiarly touching and appropriate in the continuance of these old-time customs.

The construction of these "tabernacles" furnishes a time of great amusement to young and old, for all members of the family take part in the rearing and decorating of this airy home within which the feast is to be celebrated. Some choose the large, open courtyard of the house for the site of this temporary residence and others prefer to build it on the flat roof of the house. The first thing to do is to procure the materials with which to build it.

Let us imagine ourselves in Jerusalem a few days before the feast. It is autumn, yet the sun shines brightly in a clear, blue sky, shedding a genial warmth, which makes outdoor life still very pleasant. It is eight o'clock and the men are returning home from the early morning service in the synagogue.

HEBREWS GREETING EACH OTHER

SCENE IN JERUSALEM

A CEREMONIAL PROCESSION IN BETHLEHEM

The braying of donkeys in the street proclaims the fact that the materials for building the booth have arrived. For the donkeys are laden with large bundles of long, green reeds, or hollow canes, some similar in shape to the sugar cane, but harder and stronger, and others with laurel or sweet bay, myrtle and other green and scented plants. The reeds are fresh cut and still covered with leaves. The family set to work immediately to remove the leaves and to sort the different sizes and thicknesses, cutting them all the required lengths. Then the construction of the temporary domicile begins.

There are specific rules to be observed. The booth must not be round or circular, but of four corners—that is, square or oblong; and the roof and walls must let in light and air. There should be no windows, but as many doors of entrance as is practicable. Putting up the corner pillars and joining them strongly with stretchers, the rest is formed of pretty lattice work, and in intervals the stems of green plants are inserted, which are made to cover the walls and roof, the leaves projecting inside and out. For the arched doors the choicest branches are selected. Then comes the decorating of the booth, and the women suspend glittering lamps from the roof and silk and damask curtains, hanging in graceful folds on the walls within and before the entrance. It is not the season of cultivated flowers, but lemon branches and wild flowers are procurable and festoons of them adorn the corners of the archways. The "succa" is to serve for dining and reception room during the first seven days of the feast, according to the command, "Ye shall dwell in booths seven days; all that are Israelites born shall dwell in booths." No meal must be eaten outside of it, visitors are received in it, and all religious exercises or reading must be held in it, unless driven out by rain; and it is considered a happy omen for the next year's harvest if it rains during any of the seven days.

The feast is a time of great rejoicings. Every one is attired in his handsomest garments and the Jewesses adorn themselves with all their rich jewelry and find gold-embroidered scarfs.

Services are also held in the synagogue throughout the week. On the first days of the week two scrolls of the law are brought out from their sacred place, which is a small closet in the wall, before which hang rich silken curtains, glittering with gold and silver embroidery. The privilege of carrying the precious scrolls of the law up to the pulpit, as well as that of ascending to the pulpit to listen to the reading of the law, or even that of taking part in the service by reading aloud, is purchased by auction and the proceeds go to the support of the synagogue and its "hazan."

Another interesting custom is observed on this holiday. During the morning service every one who has a son born to him during the previous year has his babe brought to him for the first time to the synagogue, dressed, of course, in exquisite garments and accompanied by one or more large wax candles, painted in bright colors and wreathed with paper flowers.

They are carried alight before the child and presented to the synagogue. It is the child's first "free-will offering" to the service of God.

The synagogue is brilliantly illuminated, for the Jews burn lamps and tapers in the daytime during worship. The walls of the synagogue are draped with the best tapestry—lent by wealthy Jewesses. In fact, the synagogue is never gayer or more beautiful than on this day of Thanksgiving.

Shortly after breakfast the girls and women, dressed up in all their beautiful finery, which their skillful fingers have wrought, and gaily decked with jewelry, issue forth in family groups, escorted by their brothers or male friends, to visit the synagogues. Boys and youths are already assembled in and about the synagogues, to see them come in and go out, the oldest girls being greeted with wishes for their marriage that year. They go up to the "Sepharim," the scrolls of the law, embrace and kiss them, looking shyly round the synagogue, and depart to make room for other groups.

Many marriages are brought about as a result of this visit to the synagogue. The whole week is a favorite time for arranging marriages by heads of families and for celebrating betrothals.

If a youth or a maiden in the home are of a marriageable age—are above 13 years—then the parents choose this feast as an appropriate occasion to plan for their marriage and even to solemnize the betrothal before the week of festivity be over, the "Succa" being a delightful and ornamental place for such a happy event. The rabbis have in charge the choosing of the right parties and arrange all matters with the parents and sometimes with the youths in question. The young girl herself has nothing to say on the subject.

When all has been satisfactorily planned to the approval of both sides of the families to be united, the ceremony is performed. Under the rustic leaf roof, surrounded by brilliant draperies and bright tapers, the young couple meet.

Whatever happy dowry the father can afford to give his daughter is mentioned, also what presents the bridegroom-elect has promised to bestow upon his bride. Holding the four corners of a large silk handkerchief, the rabbi, the father, the bride and the bridegroom answer to questions and listen to the reading of the contract.

Musicians then fill the booth with merry sounds and graceful dancers entertain the guests until a late hour. Thus ends a feast which, though permeated by religious feeling and picturesque ritual, is yet filled with joyousness and pleasure, beginning and ending with glad thanksgiving.

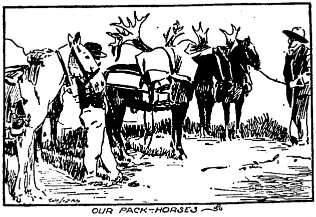
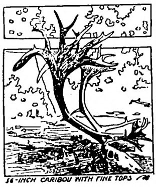
Caribou-Hunting in Cassiar



OUR PACK-HORSES



56-INCH CARIBOU WITH FINE TOPS

THE weather seemed set fine and I felt so elated with my previous success with the moose that when my hunter, Albert, proposed a retreat up the trail of five miles to a high sugar-loaf mountain on the Tuya mountains, I consented. I meant to take some chances in a second attempt to get the big caribou. Soon we reached a point opposite the mountain, and then the hard work began. I drove the horses and the Indians went in front cutting down trees, for we had to force our own trail.

September 20 is one of the red-letter days of my life, so I must give it in full. At dawn we moved our outfit about four miles to the highest clump of wood. The walking for once was easy and firm, and as we forced our way through the last of the willow scrub, one of the finest landscapes in the world was spread before our wondering eyes. Four thousand feet below was the Tanzilla, lost in great golden splashes of cotton-wood, birch and poplar. Successions of deep green fir woods rolled away to the west as far as the grand canyon of the Stikine, and looking beyond were huge mountains between that river and the Iskoot now covered with deep and permanent snow. It was a glorious day for spying, and on every point of commanding eminence we stopped and worked the glass industriously. There were hundreds of likely spots for the great caribou, but not one could we find.

"I guess wolves scare him right out of the country," said Albert, as he closed the glass with an irritable snap.

We had now walked about 12 miles, and I was feeling very tired and had great difficulty in breathing in the rarefied atmosphere.

"We will just look this last valley," said Albert, moving to the left. I searched with the glass and then gave it to Albert, who had hardly placed it to his eye when he dropped it, excitedly exclaiming:

"Caribou! plenty big bulls!"

I tore the telescope from his hand and, looking in the direction he pointed, saw a herd of over 50 caribou, including at least 12 bulls. Our first move was to descend into the valley and hide the horse.

The wind was blowing directly in our faces, so that all went well until we reached the last stick of cover. From this point we had a fine view of the caribou, many of which had by this time risen to their feet and were descending the hill. They stopped frequently to feed, and it was fully half an hour before the first stag, accompanied by two or three hinds, stood opposite our hiding place. What an immense beast he looked, and how keen I should have been to kill him had I not seen something better.

Presently another grand stag came by, but I resisted the temptation to shoot and kept my eyes glued on the big fellow who was still lying down. Finally, he arose, surrounded by five large females. I never supposed for an instant but that he would do aught but follow the others, but to my great disgust he turned and walked the other way. My heart sank to the depths of despair. Even the phlegmatic Albert fidgeted and almost said something. He kept looking intently at the herd on our left, and I could read his thoughts as he mentally planned a fresh stalk at the main herd. But even to look in that direction signified an admission of weakness on my part, so I kept the glass glued on the object of my desires till my eyes ached at watching his slow, measured steps. Again and again he stopped and looked back at his late companions, and then my heart sank as each time he dropped his massive horns and followed in the wake of the ladies, who had now commenced to snatch a few mouthfuls of food. But what is this? He has started and is galloping full speed. Has something frightened him or has some fresh bull appeared to excite his jealousy, for he is a master bull without doubt and the rut is near. He rushes beyond the leading doe and then down goes his head. The show of power drives the frightened does together and then back on the trail. They hesitate a moment and then start off at full gallop towards us. What joy! Our luck has turned. Albert's face is a study. He is incredulous and then excited. "They come now," he says to himself.

It was a reompense for the hardships of the journey to see that little troop advancing. I knew they would follow the line of the others and thus pass within easy shot. Moreover, I felt that I had been right to wait, and that pleases any man's vanity. On and on they came till the stag began to grow in size—500 yards, 400 yards, 300 yards. Now they stop and smell about the old tracks, for caribou like to follow the exact trail of others of their kind. Then an old hind puts out her neck, cocks her ears and trots slowly down the hill towards our hiding place. Albert worms himself into a desirable support behind my right shoulder, and all is in readiness for his majesty. The nearer he comes the bigger his horns look and, although not long, they contain a forest of points such as I had never seen before. A merciful Providence causes the bull to stop just where the others had stood, but he is covered by two hinds and I must wait till they have moved. He pokes one gently out of the way and then himself moves forward a step or two to smell the earth. It is enough; the sight is on his shoulder and I let go. He swings round once, shaking his head, and then rolls over with all four legs in the air. I give a whoop of triumph, for those great antlers are mine, and I rush down the hill for the possible chance of a long shot at one of the stags on the opposite hill. They are 500 yards away at least, and all jammed together in a solid pack as a result of the shot. A little forest of antlers stands out above a darkness of bodies. It is hopeless to fire, as the stags are all at the back, and I must wait till they string out and run. Now they are off, tearing over the hills in a mad race. One stag shows to the right on the skyline and I salute him with two shots. But it is hopeless, as I cannot see the striking point of the bullets. A loud call on the part of Albert now directs my attention to the stag I had shot, and I see him struggling to regain his feet, so I at once place a bullet through the lungs, which produces immediate collapse. The first shot, it seems, had gone a little to high and too far forward, between the neck and shoulder.

I have killed many fine stags in other lands, but I shall always remember that day on the glorious Tuya mountains when a little self-restraint met with a result equal to one's highest hopes.

Gossip of Washington

What Is Going On at the National Capital.

Lost Money Orders Worth Millions

WANTED CLAIMANTS FOR $10,000,000

WASHINGTON.—A Washington woman discovered some days ago that her German nurse was destroying the money orders she purchased to remit to the Fatherland. She had torn up within the last five years more than $500 of money orders, thinking they were receipts for the money deposited in the office at Washington and that the money had been duly sent to her old mother in Germany.

This incident recalls the fact that there has accumulated in the national treasury millions of dollars, possibly ten millions, since the establishment of the present system in 1864. The government assumes the role of trustee for the safe transfer of money from one individual to another, and the protection is nearly perfect, yet Uncle Sam cannot always remedy the carelessness or ignorance of persons buying money orders.

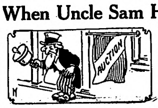
An official, speaking of the system, said: "This vast accumulation of money is steadily being augmented from year to year, and unless the people become better acquainted with the character of a money order transaction the accumulated sum promises to become almost fabulous. This money has accumulated through no fault of the United States. The system is perfect and instructions are clear and ample.

"For one thing it is known that persons purchasing money orders ignorantly destroy them, believing that the order constitutes nothing more than a receipt. Many persons also are in the habit of purchasing money orders before traveling from one place to another, with a view of converting them into cash as needed, and these are lost through carelessness, by fire, etc.

"It also frequently happens that orders are sent to wrong addresses, and after repeated attempts on the part of the postoffice department to find the payee or remitter, are sent to the department, together with advices, as unpaid.

"In one instance a claim for the payment of a lost postal note was allowed 25 years after it became invalid. It will be seen that as trustee for its citizens in the transfer of private funds the United States exercises diligence in an attempt to find the rightful owner. And yet millions are still outstanding for which claimants will never appear. This vast sum is held in suspense by the government."

When Uncle Sam Has an Auction Sale



THE number of going; going, gone sales which the government conducts ought to qualify Uncle Sam for admission to the guild of auctioneers. These sales are the real thing, too, red flag and all.

The tourist in Washington gets a shock when he is passing the back of the department of agriculture building these days and sees a big red flag with the usual white letters sewed on: "Auction To-day." He wonders if the government is restoring to desperate means of raising the wind.

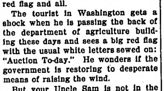
But your Uncle Sam is not in the auction business from necessity. The agriculture sales are explained in this way. Whenever an invoice of any article of food arrives from abroad a certain number of packages are taken by the government for examination to see whether the article complies with our food laws.

For instance, olive oil, Maraschino cherries, wine, sardines, mushrooms, French peas, preserves and jams—in fact all imported food articles—come under this regulation. But though the government requires half a dozen packages to be turned over to it for inspection—in order to avoid the chance of a single one being fixed up and slipped off upon them—the analysis rarely goes beyond the contents of one specimen out of the six.

So that of each consignment of six cans of olive oil, six bottle of cherries or of champagne or six cans of sardines, five remain untouched. If graft were really as prevalent as the muckrakers would have us believe the entire six packages would probably be opened and a nip taken from each one, while the rest of the contents would be appropriated as a legitimate perquisite of office (by the heads of the department).

Instead of that, five out of six of the articles received for analysis under the law are sold at these auctions behind the department building. The receipts go into the exchequer of the bureau.

Disaster to Japanese Editor's Chin



LACK of mastery of the English language led to the loss of a carefully cultivated beard which graced the chin of S. Zumoto, editor of the Japan Times of Tokyo and a member of the commercial commission visiting this country. Mr. Zumoto visited the barber shop in the hotel at which he is a guest.

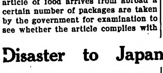
"I would like to be shaved," he said, in halting English. "Not altogether, but conservatively."

He carressed his vandyke as he spoke. The barber, a taciturn workman, said nothing, but tucked the towels and aprons and other articles of his trade in and around the Japanese editor's neck. Then he began.

Americans in the shop were startled when they heard a flow of what probably was strong language in Japanese. The barber had encroached on the Japanese imperial, with the result that nearly half of it fell beneath his keen blade before the customer could protest. It was necessary then to cut it all off.

Members of the Japanese party enjoyed the situation. M. Zumoto declined to see it in a humorous light.

Farmer Is Real Spender, Says Wilson



"THE average laborer is living better to-day than did Queen Elizabeth in her time," said Secretary Wilson of the department of agriculture. He was speaking of the prosperity of the farmers in the west and of the high wages of the workingman in the east.

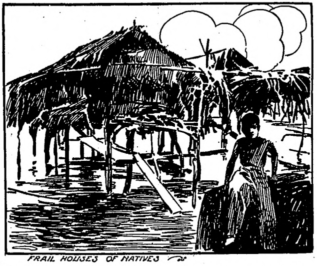
"Take the meat bills of the laborer in Washington," he said. "You will find that they eat meat three times a day—most of them—and they are not content with any kind, but demand the best cuts. They can afford them. As a consequence the price of meat is high. While the farmers are producing more beef every year, they are not producing enough to meet the increase in population. I do not expect prices to fall soon."

Secretary Wilson was asked if western farmers really were investing large sums of money in automobiles.

"There is too much truth in those reports," he responded. "The farmer is out of debt. He has paid for his farm, his fences and his machinery. He has money in his pockets and big crops continue to come on. He is afraid to invest in eastern securities, lest a year bring trouble there. Therefore he puts his money in luxuries, instead of channels that might give a return. People in the east do not know what luxuries are; they must go west to find that out.

"The farmer is handicapped by lack of labor. Too many have gone from the farm to the sidewalk. I hope that education along agricultural lines will remedy this, but the tide has not yet turned. But by means of improved machinery the farmer to-day can do many times as much as he accomplished ten years ago. He does it with ease, too, for he sits at nearly all his work nowadays."

Moros a Fierce Race



FRAIL HOUSES OF NATIVES

THE flourishing town of Zamboanga, in the Philippine islands, is well laid out and the ever-present Chino supplies the modest wants of life. The military post is just outside the fort and supplied with the most comfortable and pretentious houses I have seen in any garrison over here. As Zamboanga is a peaceful province one can drive through Morotown without anxiety. The smell of dried fish greets one everywhere. Part of the village is built out over the water and the glimpses of life in it are most interesting.

At Jolo a carriage was waiting for us and we drove at once beyond the walled city and out through the famous avenue of palms. Later we walked beyond the walls, and through Morotown. Six guards stand before the gate and warn everyone of the danger of going beyond the walls on foot and repeat the prohibition for officers to do so unarmed. We were told that only a few days before our arrival a Moro had attacked one of the guards; but we had not come thus far to be cheated of so unusual an experience, and the element of real danger had its charms; so armed with a loaded revolver, a sharp kris and a parasol we started out. After crossing the bridge, where we were quite out of hearing of the garrison, we walked one behind the other and kept a sharp lookout on every side. At the well in the center of Morotown we stopped for a good look at the spot where three of our soldiers were attacked while they were sitting there chatting three months before.

These Moros trace their origin to the Mohammedan invaders and like all of their tribe hate Christians and believe that for every one killed another degree of felicity is attained for the after life. In a condition of religious insanity the "juramentada" takes an oath to kill Christians until he himself is killed. He shaves his eyebrows and head, works himself into a state of frenzy during a night devoted to religious excesses and then starts out on the warpath. Death being the only possible end for him, he is entirely fearless and reckless.

Beyond the wall in Morotown a long rickety pier runs out into the water and we walked the length of it, entering many of the houses to bargain for brass and chow baskets. On these occasions we kept our backs to the wall and hurried on when we noticed any of them stopping too long to examine us with their cruel glances. They will kill as readily to procure a firearm as for anything else and it was impossible not to feel constant anxiety, as we knew the danger to be entirely real. We were too far from the walls for cries to be heard, and even a shot, if it brought rescue at all, could do so only too late. It was intensely interesting, intensely exciting, but the tension was too great to be a pleasure for long, and I was glad to be safe back inside the walls again. Here we were met at every turn by Moros selling pearls, and as we had nothing to fear from those inside we had leisure to examine them and their wares. Jolo is famous for its pearl fisheries, and although the best pearls are bought up before they reach the visitor's hand, some pretty ones can be found.

There was a fascination about being in the very heart of the country of those Malay pirates whose deeds were among the favorite stories of childhood. The name Sulu is to the inhabitants of other islands synonymous with treachery and ferocity. Piracy was a regular trade among the natives, whose daring exploits carried them as far as Singapore and New Guinea, where they spread misery and devastation. As far north as Malabang on the Celebes sea there are blockhouses along the coast for refuge from these sea robbers. Seen from the water the town of Jolo is extremely picturesque, the occasional red roof of a foreign building in no wise lessening the uncivilized appearance of the whole. Rising behind the town is Mount Dajo, made famous by the wonderful assault and capture of it by our troops. Cotabato, Parang-Parang and Malabang, on the Celebes sea, were next touched at, and then after another stop at Zamboanga and again at Camp Overton the course lay toward Cebu in the Visays.

Cebu is a prosperous town and a great trade center, hemp and coal being its chief exports. Shells of every description are for sale, but otherwise there is little one cares to buy. Here in the Church of Santo Nino is preserved a little black statue of the Holy Child which was brought over by Magellan. The collection of jewels for it is said to be priceless. They were stored in Hongkong during the insurrection, and they remain there, as the duty is too high to permit of their being brought back. Across the strait is the little island of Mactan, where Magellan was killed.

On leaving Cebu we stopped at Ormoc in Leyte and then anchored for a short while in Carigura bay to unload provisions for Tacloban. At Calbayog, Samar, we stopped for a couple of hours only, and then made for home, and were met in Verde passage by the steam launch from Batangas, which brought us to land in two hours.

With visions of waving palms and bamboos and a riotous burst of color in your mental picture of the tropics, Manila is a disappointing reality, as it lies low and business-like along the water front. The dolce far niente of southern climes seems to have no place in this commercial metropolis, where everything is life and bustle. The great bay is large enough to accommodate the fleets of the world and an enormous breakwater built out from the mainland gives shelter to at least forty large vessels. At all times the roadstead is filled with ships, and the clanking of chains, the tooting of whistles and the rapid liquid speech of the native coolies working along the water front create a lively scene.

The houses are raised high above the ground to avoid the dangerous earth vapors which the Tagals call "alimoon," and seek to avoid at the beginning of the rainy reason; the walls are fitted with slides of lattice work into which shells are inserted instead of glass, and with these drawn back the house looks like an open pavilion. The ground floor is occupied by shops or used as a grain store room or carriage shed, and not infrequently as a stable, in which case the walls are dispensed with. These native houses are built of hard wood, mostly of mahogany, which is disfigured with whitewash and paint, some of them being resplendent in pink, blue or yellow. The living rooms are reached by a flight of stone steps running up on the outside. Rents in Manila are high, 200 or 300 pesos ($100 or $150) being the average price per month for a dwelling of moderate size.

The city of Manila proper is a huge fortress, surrounded by high stone walls and bastions and bulwarks on the landward side and protected by a moat which may be flooded by means of sluices to cut off the city. Fort Santiago, the citadel, guards the entrance to the Pasig, which divides Manila into two parts—the walled city just described and the commercial centers.

The Escolta in Binondo is the principal shopping street and it is prosperous looking with its many pedestrians, its trolley cars and electric lights; the shops are up to date and almost all desires can be satisfied if you are willing to pay Manila prices. Here, as everywhere in the islands, John Chinaman absorbs a large part of the trade and is the picture of contentment as he lazily smokes his pipe in the doorway.

THE FLIGHT TO CANADA.

Last year 60,000 persons possessed of 60,000,000 American coined dollars or the equivalent crossed over to the new land of plenty, and this year the official figure will show that 70,000 persons and $70,000,000 have followed. Ten years ago the numbers were too slight to excite comment. Ten years hence the loss of desirable Americans doubtless will outnumber the gain of foreigners, with a corresponding loss of dollars in proportion to which the gain through immigration will be beggarly. While it is not likely that the exodus of farmers will continue to increase at its present ratio, that there will be a steady stream pouring over the line for many years is the belief of those qualified to speak. Canadian statisticians figure that by the end of the century the population will have increased to 50,000,000, with ample room for as many more. That the full significance of the movement has not dawned on the people of this country is evident from the fact that press and public are still bidding god-speed to the departing thousands of good citizens, and without giving a thought as to the disappearing millions of good money. When they come to see things in another light there is apt to be great agitation of mind, says Washington Post. But what can we do about it? Against the inrush of impecunious foreigners it is possible to erect barriers, but against the outrush of well-to-do farmers what obstacle can be interposed? What alternative can be urged?

The announcement that the Russian government is arranging for a loan of $125,000,000 from British capitalists is significant of changed conditions in European politics. The alliance between France and Russia long gave preference to French money lenders whenever the St. Petersburg government required funds. The bulk of the money needed for the war with Japan was raised in Paris, and the reluctance of the French financiers to continue their loans, in view of the Russian disasters on sea and land, was a very powerful factor in moving Russia to accept the proffered mediation of this country. But the dual alliance is no longer a supremely important factor in Russian politics or in Russian finance. An understanding has been reached with England which, while not constituting an offensive and defensive alliance, has done much to allay suspicion and to promote good will.

The new regime in Turkey promises to be of more than sentimental interest in the United States. The development of the country offers opportunities for successful American enterprise. Modern methods of agriculture, with the use of machinery, will render profitable great tracts of land. Much mineral wealth also awaits development. Inland towns need railways and wagon roads. Constantinople, a city of nearly a million inhabitants, has no electric lights or railways and no telephone. It has inadequate waterworks and only a poor ice plant. Capital is invited to make investments, and promises are made of large concessions and franchises.

No king ever showed a more conciliatory spirit than King George is displaying in the face of the present troubles in Greece. He exhibited this spirit anew in the manner in which he compelled his sons to resign from the army. At his instance the chamber of deputies passed the bills abolishing the right of the crown prince to serve as commander-in-chief, and that of the other princes to hold commissions. By his own act, therefore, the military party which brought on the revolution of last August is deprived of its last ground for complaint against the dynasty.

The exhibition of American manufacturers, to be held in Berlin, Germany, next year, should be a success, both because of the purpose aimed at and on account of the eminence and ability of the American business men who are in the management. American manufacturers are beginning to appreciate the opportunities open in foreign lands, and an exhibition like that proposed for Berlin is certain to be invaluable in making people abroad familiar with American products. It is coming to the point where "Made in America" is a guarantee of excellence

Out in the state of Washington a nine-year-old boy has killed a big deer. It is a pleasure to be able to say that he did not in his efforts to bring down the buck mistake anybody for a rabbit or a wild turkey.

The Turkish government has offered great encouragement to the Zionist movement by inviting Jews of all countries to colonise the lands along the Bagdad railway. This is quite a change from the policy of the old regime.

PEOPLE TRIUMPH IN THE COURTS

STANDARD OIL COMPANY DECREED TO DISSOLUTION. ATTORNEY FRANK B. KELLOGG WINS BRILLIANT VICTORY OVER LAWLESS CORPORATION.

* * * * * * * * * * * * *

WHAT DECISION MEANS.

The upholding of the Sanborn opinion in the Standard Oil case means:

The possible criminal prosecution of John D. Rockefeller, William Rockefeller, John D. Archbold, Oliver H. Payne, Henry M. Flagler and Charles M. Pratt.

The dissolution of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey.

The success of the government's suit against the coal railroads, which is being prosecuted on evidence furnished by William Randolph Hearst.

The success of the government's suit against the tobacco trust.

Renders the United States Steel corporation liable to a similar suit.

It will absolutely destroy the effectiveness of corporations running to New Jersey and forming holding companies.

It will end all combinations to control business; will restore competition throughout the country; and will protect the independent owner and manufacturer who is today struggling for a living.

St. Paul.—In the government's suit against the Standard Oil Company. The United States circuit court ordered the corporation to be dissolved, it being an illegal corporation. The decision was filed in St. Paul and St. Louis.

The case was heard in the United States circuit court at St. Louis in April, 1909, by Circuit Judges Sanborn of St. Paul, Vandevanter of Cheyenne, Hook of Leavenworth, and Adams of St. Louis.

Judge Sanborn of St. Paul, the presiding judge, wrote the opinion and the decree, in which all the judges concur, and sent them with a concurring opinion of Judge Hook to Judge Adams at St. Louis, who filed them and entered the decree in this city.

Argued by Frank B. Kellogg.

The case was argued by Frank B. Kellogg of St. Paul, and Charles B. Morrison of Chicago, for the United States, and John G. Milburn of Buffalo, David T. Watson of Pittsburg, Moritz Rosenthal of Chicago, and John G. Johnson of Philadelphia, on behalf of the defendants.

The action was brought to enjoin John D. Rockefeller, William Rockefeller, Henry M. Flagler, Henry H. Rogers, John D. Archbold, Oliver H. Payne, Charles M. Pratt, the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey and about 70 other corporations from maintaining a combination and conspiracy in restraint of trade, to monopolize interstate and international commerce and the decree grants the injunction sought by the government.

Opinion of Public Men.

Attorney General, Geo. W. Wickersham—"It is one of the most important decisions ever rendered in this country.

"I am very much gratified at the decision, of course. But until I have been able to see the full text, any opinion I might express must naturally be of my personal nature.

A decision of dissolution against a great corporation like that of the Standard Oil Company is the utmost that could have been imposed by law upon the great monopoly which has been the object of the anti-trust legislation."

Congressman Fred C. Stevens.—"It is one of the most remarkable legal victories in the history of the country," says Congressman Fred C. Stevens of St. Paul. "It is remarkable not only in the enormous amount of work that was necessarily placed upon Mr. Kellogg in the preparation of the case, but for the far-reaching results of the decision. The court evidently considered in mind that it would not meet with the same fate as the decision of Judge Landis against the Standard Oil Company in the appellate court.

"I know that Mr. Kellogg prepared this case with the utmost care so that if the decision should be favorable in the lower court it would be sustained on appeal.'

Gov. Eberhart.—"I am glad that the government has won as I undersand it has. I hope that the text of the decision will confirm all the encouraging reports of the press in their statements of today."

State Auditor Iverson. — "The decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals —the next to the highest court in the council, a court recognized by all as exceptionally able in its pendings, will cause a great wave of satisfaction to pass over the country."

Victory for Minnesotans.

It is peculiarly gratifying to the people of Minnesota that in this mighty conflict of legal giants, a native born son of the state was selected by president Roosevelt and his cabinet to represent the cause of the government and contest the rights of the people.

Frank B. Kellogg's achievement in this case places him in the very forefront of American lawyers whose accomplishments have been of substantial benefit to mankind. It is also noteworthy that another Minnesotan, Judge Walter H. Sanborn, wrote the opinion in this famous case. It will further be recalled that this distinguished jurist received his appointment to his present position through the influence of former United States senator Cushman K. Davis. Minnesota may rightfully feel proud of the part her illustrious sons have borne in this gigantic contest to overthrow the greatest octopus in the world's history.

Roosevelt Starts the Fight.

It was three years ago that President Roosevelt summoned the brilliant Minnesota lawyer, Frank B. Kellogg, before his cabinet and gained his consent to conduct the assault in the greatest legal battle ever contested in this country, and which resulted last Saturday in the decision of the United States court of appeals that is a sweeping affirmation of every contention urged by the government in its suit for the dissolution of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, "the greatest trust in the world."

The opinion of the court, written by Judge Sanborn, sustains the contentions of the government in every point and in full detail. It reviews the origin and history of the Standard Oil Company, showing the wizard-like financial operations of the master minds that conceived and executed the plans for the organization and points out plainly the particulars in which such operations have been in violation of the law and contrary to public policy. The court holds that the combination as formed and operated is a conspiracy to strifle, or directly and substantially restrict free competition in commerce between the states, and therefore is wholly and unqualifiedly in violation of the law under which the prosecution against it was instituted.

Frank B. Kellogg.

The Sweeping Decree.

Having found the defendants guilty of the charges brought by the government, the court's decree is a sweeping order designed to end the abuses which have so long obtained. The Standard Oil Company of New Jersey is enjoined from voting the stock of any of the companies of which it has secured control; other companies are enjoined from paying dividends to the Standard and from allowing their stock to be voted by the Standard; all partnerships and agreements between the Standard and other companies are ordered canceled; and that every act now being performed by the Standard and its affiliated companies that tends to restrict or stifle free competition in commerce or to form a monopoly in control of the petroleum business of the nation is enjoined and prohibited. The decree also directly and explicitly prohibits the Standard and its allies from hereafter taking any steps, making any plans or forming any alliances, the effect of teitherdriectly or indirectly any or the things prohibited and declared illegal by the court's findings in the case at issue.

Free Competition.

The decree declares the ownership by the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey of the stock of all the other corporations to be illegal, and prohibits the exercise of any control over the various corporations by the principal company. It also prohibits any of the defendant corporations, or the individuals, from accomplishing the same purpose of placing the control of the same corporations, or any two or more of them in the hands of any trustees, persons, or corporations, from managing or operating them together or in harmony, or from making any express or implied agreement one with the other for the purpose of controlling the management of the corporations or the prices of petroleum and its products or the rates of transportation; and it prohibits the defendants from engaging in any interstate commerce while the combination continues. This, if sustained, will end all combinations to control business, and will restore competition throughout the country, and will protect the independent manufacturer who is today struggling for a living.

Startling Figures.

It appears in this case that the Standard Oil is the most gigantic corporation in the world. On an original investment of $69,000,000, the Standard Oil Company has paid in dividends since the organization of the Trust down to and including 1906, $548,436,436.87, and at the end of 1906 had a surplus of over $261,000,000 on its books. It has actually earned on this investment of $69,000,000 over $1,000,000,000, and during the last few years has earned over 100 per cent. per annum. These profits have been made principally in this country, as the foreign companies have made much less profit than the companies doing business in America. Some of the American companies, like the Standard Oil Company of Indiana,—one of the principal subsidiary companies,—on a total capital and investment of $1,000,000 has earned $10,000,000 per annum; in other words, 1051.6 per cent. and has a surplus of over $24,000,000. The Combination controls from 85 to 97 per cent. of the various branches of the petroleum business in the United States, and practically all of the lubricating-oil business of railways. It has directors in all the leading railways of the country, and it is a dominant force in the country's financial institutions.

No Political Significance.

The Standard Oil victory is supposed to make Mr. Kellogg a candidate for the United States Senate. When asked relative to this possibility, he declined to be interviewed. "I have absolutely nothing to say about that,' he said, 'I am not prosecuting the Standard Oil case for political effect, but as a lawyer for the Government."

Judge Sanborn's Opinion

The nature of the case and the character of the decision appear from the syllabus of Judge Sanborn's opinion, which reads as follows:

"Congress has power under the commercial clause of the constitution to regulate and restrict the use of commerce among the several states and with foreign nations of contracts, of the method of holding title to property and of every other instrumentality employed in that commerce so far as it may be necessary to do in order to prevent the restraint thereof denounced by the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, 26 stat. 209.

"The test of the legality of a combination under this act is its necessary effect upon competition in commerce among the states or with foreign nations.

"If its necessary effect is only incidentally or indirectly to restrict that competition while its chief result is to foster the trade and increase the business of those who make and operate it, it does not violate that law.

"But if its necessary effect is to stifle or directly and substantially to restrict free competition in commerce among the states or with foreign nations it is illegal within the meaning of that statute.

"The power to restrict competition in commerce among the several states or with foreign nations vested in a person or an association of persons by a combination is indicative of the character of the combination, because it is to the interests of parties that such a power should be exercised and the presumtion is that it will be.

Many Firms Knit Together.

"The combination in a single corporation or person by an exchange of stock of the power of many stockholders holding the same proportions respectively of the majority of the stock of each of several corporations engaged in commerce in the same article among the states, or with foreign nations, to restrict competition therein, renders the power thus vested in the former greater, more easily exercised, more durable and more effective than that previously held by the stockholders, and it is illegal.

"In 1899 the stockholders of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey owned a majority of the stock of 19 other corporations in the same proportions that they owned the stock of the Standard Company and those 20 corporations controlled by the ownership of the majority of their stock, or otherwise many other corporations. Each of these corprations was engaged in some part of the business of producing, buying, refining, transporting and selling petroleum and its products and they were conducting about 30 per cent. of the production of the crude oil and more than 75 per cent. of the business of purchasing, refining, transporting and selling petroleum and its products in this country. Many of them were engaged in commerce in these articles, among the several states and with foreign nations, and were naturally competitive:

Competitors Disappeared.

"During the 10 years prior to 1879 the seven individual defendants had acquired control of many corporations, partnerships and refineries that had been competing in this business, had placed the majority of the stock of those corporations and the interests in property and business thus obtained in various trustees to be held and operated by them for the stockholders of the Standard Oil Company, of Ohio, one of the 19 companies in which the individual defendants were principal stockholders, and had thereby suppressed competition among these corporations and partnerships.

"In 1879 they and their associates caused all the trustees to convey their interests in the stock, property and business of all these corporations to five trustees to be held, operated and distributed by them for the stockholders of the Standard Company of Ohio. From 1879 until 1892 they prevented these corporations and others engaged in this business, where they secured control, from competing in this commerce by causing the control of their operations, and generally of a majority of their stocks, to be held in trust for the stockholders of the Standard company, of Ohio, and from 1892 until 1899 they accomplished the same result by a similar stockholding device and by the joint equitable ownership of the majority of the stocks of the corporations.

All Merged in 1899.

"In the year 1899 the seven individual defendants and their associates caused the majority of the stock of the 19 corporations to be transferred to the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey in exchange for its stock, so that the latter company thereby acquired the legal title to a majority of the stock of each of the 19 companies, the control of these companies and of all the companies which they controlled and the power to fix the rates of transportation, the purchase and selling prices of petroleum and its products, which all these corporations should pay and receive in the conduct of their business in commerce among the states and with foreign nations.

"Since that exchange of stock the seven individual defendants have been and are stockholders and officers of the Standard Company of New Jersey, which has exercised and is still using that power, and by its use it has prevented and is still preventing competition in commerce among the states and with foreign nations among these corporations.

Branded "Conspiracy."

"Held, the transaction constituted a combination and conspiracy in restraint of and to monopolize commerce among the states and with foreign nations in violation of sections 1 and 2 of the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, and the government is entitled to an injunction against the further continuance and operation thereof."

The decree enjoins the seven individual defendants, the Standard Oil Company and its subsidiary corporations, from continuing or carrying into effect the illegal combination they have formed and from entering into any like combination or conspiracy the effect of which will be to restrain interstate commerce in petroleum or its products, or to prolong the unlawful monopoly of such commerce obtained by the defendants as stated in the decree, and they are forbidden from engaging or continuing in interstate commerce until they discontinue their illegal combination. The decree takes effect 30 days from the date of its filing unless suspended by an appeal to the supreme court.

Twenty Miners Rescued.

Cherry, Illinois.—Twenty men alive and comparatively well have arisen from their grave. Before 12 more hours elapsed it is believed that at least 100 will have followed them in arising from the fiery sepulchre in which they have been entombed here for a week.

From the moment they were entrapped in the blazing shaft last Saturday afternoon until they were carried from the mine the men battled with death.

Squads, relieving each other at frequent intervals, are working frantically to remove obstacles obstructing the east workings of the St. Paul mine, for here, if anywhere, it is believed more survivors await deliverance.

All day Sunday the vigil endured. At the end of it, no living man or boy had been added to the list of the 20 rescued Saturday. At nightfall the toll still stood 20 saved, 92 known dead and 198 missing.

Eighteen bodies were interred in a field south of the town Sunday.

BANDITS SENTENCED FOR LIFE.

Men Convicted of U. P. Roberry at Omaha Give Notice of an Appeal.

Omaha, Neb. — Judge Under sentenced the five men convicted of holding up and robbing a Union Pacific passenger train in this city last May, to life imprisonment in the federal prison at Fort Leavenworth.

Notice was given of an appeal to the circuit court of appeals. The prisoners will be taken to Fort Leavenworth this week.

Alexander's Trial in Month.

Cairo, Illinois.—Judge W. N. Butler, of the circuit court announces that no special term of court would be called to try Arthur Alexander, the negro, who was taken out of the city to avoid a lynching, but his case would come up at the regular December term of court which commences Dec. 6. Judge Butler also said that no investigation of the double lynching here last week would be made before December. A special grand jury may be called for the purpose early in December.

THANKSGIVING DAY

Canada's Day of Thanks a Month Earlier Than in the United States.

For some reason better known to the Canadians themselves than to the people on this side of the line, our Canadian cousins celebrated their Thanksgiving a month or more earlier than we do. It may be that the Canadian turkey had become impatient, and sounded a note of warning, or it may be that the "frost on the pumpkin" declared itself. But whatever the reason, their Thanksgiving day is past. It may have been that the reasons for giving thanks so much earlier than we do were pushing themselves so hard and so fast that the Canadians were ashamed to postpone the event. They have had reasons, and good ones, too, for giving thanks. Their great broad areas of prairie land have yielded in abundance, and here, by the way, it is not uninteresting to the friends of the millions of Americans who have made their home in Canada during the past few years to know that they have participated most generously in the "cutting of the melon." Probably the western portion of Canada, comprising the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, have the greatest reason of any of the provinces to express in the most enthusiastic manner their gratitude. The results in the line of production give ample reason for devout thanksgiving to Providence. This year has surpassed all others in so far as the total increase in the country's wealth is concerned. There is no question that Providence was especially generous. The weather conditions were perfect, and during the ripening and harvesting period, there was nothing to interfere. And now it was well it was so, for with a demand for labor that could not be supplied, there was the greatest danger, but with suitable weather the garnering of the grain has been successfully accomplished. There have been low general averages, but these are accounted for by the fact that farmers were indifferent, relying altogether upon what a good soil would do. There will be no more low averages though, for this year has shown what good, careful farming will do. It will produce 130 million bushels of wheat from seven million acres, and it will produce a splendid lot of oats, yielding anywhere from 50 to 100 bushels per acre. This on land that has cost but from $10 to $15 per acre—many farmers have realized sufficient from this year's crop to pay the entire cost of their farms. The Toronto Globe says:

"The whole population of the West rejoices in the bounty of Providence, and sends out a message of gratitude and appreciation of the favors which have been bestowed on the country. The cheerfulness which has abounded with industry during the past six months has not obliterated the conception of the source from which the blessings have flown, and the good feeling is combined with a spirit of thankfulness for the privilege of living in so fruitful a land. The misfortunes of the past are practically forgotten, because there is great cause to contemplate with satisfaction the comforts of the present. Thanksgiving should be a season of unusual enthusiasm."

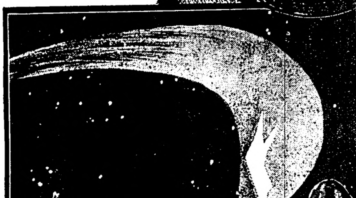
WHEN A COMET FELL ON EARTH

WHAT MIGHT TAKE PLACE IF HALLEYS COMET WERE SHIPWRECKED AS BIELA'S WAS.

THE astronomers announce that Halley's comet is approaching the earth at the rate of a million miles a day. As Halley's is the most splendidly attractive (otherwise the most alarming) of all our regular comets, they add that we need not fear that it will strike the earth, because it will not come closer to us than 13,000,000 miles.

This is the scientific schedule, but that does not keep any one who wishes to be inspired with proper awe on the approach of our most remarkable comet, from asking what might take place if, for any reason it leaves the scientific schedule, as Biela's comet did when it did the most remarkable thing thus far known in the history of the solar system since men have begun to watch the sky. That is, after coming back over and over on schedule time, until it was supposed to be as regular as the earth itself, it split in two, underwent final shipwreck somewhere in the heavens, and according to the last supposed to be known of it, fell on earth several hundred miles southeast of El Paso, Tex.



HALLEY'S COMET AS IT APPEARED IN 1835

The probability that this was the last of that comet is conceded by such cautious astronomers as Prof. Young of Princeton. It is an authentic record, valued because it is about as near the history of Biela's comet as we will ever get. It is certainly lost, and it is thought that we have the last trace of it on earth now in a lump of nickel-iron which fell in Mexico, when supposed fragments of the lost comet (called "Bielids" after the astronomer, Biela, who discovered it) were being watched for and expected to fall in a shower somewhere on earth, if they were not burned to vapor by heat from friction as they were being whirled through the earth's atmosphere in falling. Although Halley's comet has been coming back regularly every 76 or 77 years since it is supposed to have appeared with its tail filling the sky before the fall of Jerusalem, it may end finally as Biela's comet did, falling in a star shower on earth, or on some other planet, or into the sun, or scattering through space around the sun in masses perhaps of nickel-iron, unseen on earth, unless the earth captures them out of space and sets them blazing through the sky as they fall.

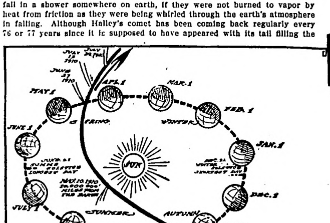


DIAGRAM SHOWING COURSE OF HALLEY'S COMET DURING 1909 AND 1910

Suppose we were to capture Halley's comet and it were really to fall, what would become of the earth or of the comet?

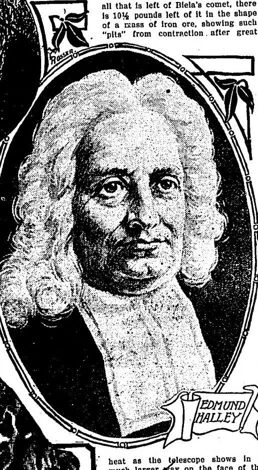
That is a fair question for all who wish to keep a proper scientific awe of our finest regular comet. It may offer something to take the place of the unscientific awe which used to send thousands to their knees, remembering their sins and praying for pardon as soon as Halley's comet began to spread its magnificent tail across the sky. In other words, it made them try to think, which was, no doubt, the best thing a comet could do for them.

Another important question is whether Halley's comet will bring its magnificent tail back with it, restored to its ancient and awful splendor. If it does not, the world, learned and unlearned, will be disappointed, for a comet without a tail is not awful or sublime enough to be worth growing either enthusiastic or repentant over. We cannot tell about the tail. It may come back with the comet, reduced 30 per cent., or it may finally be lost altogether or increased back to awful magnificence, streaming across the sky in such a spectacle as can be hoped for on earth only once in a lifetime.

If it recovers its tail in its full historic splendor, Halley's will be too magnificent a comet to be lost, according to our ways of looking at comets. It is not a third-rate astronomer's comet, like Biela's, but a comet for everybody, with all mankind interested in it. It may set all the gongs in Asia beating while we are watching it through telescopes. Millions who do not know enough to be frightened at the idea of its striking the earth may find it awful enough to make them try hard to think, with results which, while they last, may seem to them the most awful they ever felt in their lives.

While all who are intelligently interested in comets will want Halley's back regularly, tail and all, as something to think about, there is a chance that it will lose its tail and also a chance, very remote now, that it may be shipwrecked finally and lost in space. It is a "chance" only until the law is learned. The chance is worth discussing only in the hope of learning more of the law. Can a comet lawfully get out of its regular path and be pulled down finally by the earth or some other planet? That is a question of law and as far as we have learned the law the answer is that it can.

We do not know much yet about the law. All we are beginning to find out dates from the night in January, 1846, when Prof. Challis looked through his telescope at the Cambridge observatory and could not believe his eyes. The spectacle he saw in the heavens was too astonishing to believe. It was Biela's comet split into two distinct comets. Such a thing had never been heard of or imagined as possible. But in some way it had actually occurred. Had the comet exploded by its own forces? Had it come in reach of the attraction of one of the planets and been pulled apart? What must become of a comet after being thus split in pieces? Could it come within range of the earth and be captured and pulled down to the surface? If so, would it jar the earth in its orbit or set the planet on fire?



EDMUND HALLEY

The "BIELID" of 1885 SUPPOSED FRAGMENT OF BIELA'S COMET

All we will ever have in the way of a final answer to these questions as they belong to the complete and final loss of Biela's comet is given officially now in the records of Mexico in the statement recorded by Senor Jose A. y Bonilla, director of the astronomical observatory in the state of Zacatecas. In November, 1885, it was supposed that between the twenty-fourth and twenty-ninth of the month the earth would pass in space through or near the fragments left by Biela's comet. As they were then called "Bielids," it had been concluded that they were a swarm of hundreds of thousands or perhaps of millions of small masses of meteoric matter, perhaps weighing from an ounce up to a ton or more. It was feared that if the earth passed through them and drew them to the surface in daylight they would not be seen at all, but would either burn up in gas or else fall in a few scattering stones on distant parts of the earth. This may have occurred in other places, but on a ranch near Mazapil, in the state of Zacatecas, one of them (or a mass of nickel-iron belonging to some group of the same kind) was seen to fall and recovered at once by the owner of the ranch, who made the deposition taken down in Spanish by Senor Bonilla and translated by William Earl Hidden, to close the last chapter in the story of Biela's lost comet:

"It was about 7 o'clock on the night of November 27 (1885)," said the ranchman in his deposition, "when I went out to the corral to feed the horses. Suddenly I heard a loud, sizzing noise, exactly as though something red hot was being plunged into cold water and almost instantly there followed a somewhat loud thud. At once the corral was covered with a phosphorescent light, while suspended in the air were small, luminous sparks, as though from a rocket. I had not recovered from my surprise before I saw this luminous air disappear and there remained on the ground only such a light as is made when a match is rubbed. A number of people came running towards me from the neighboring houses and they helped me to quiet the horses, which had become much excited. We were afraid of being burned. We all asked what could be the matter. In a few moments, when we had recovered from our fear, we saw the light disappear. Bringing lanterns, we found a hole in the ground and in it a ball of light. We retired to a little distance, fearing it would explode and harm us. Looking up to the sky, we saw exhalations or stars which went out without noise. We returned after a little and found in the hole a hot stone we could barely handle. This, on the next day, we saw looked like a piece of iron. All night it rained stars. We saw none fall to the ground, as they all seemed to be extinguished while yet high up."

If this stone, the only one known to have reached the earth out of the "rain of stars," is all that is left of Biela's comet, there is 10½ pounds left of it in the shape of a mass of iron ore, showing such "pits" from contraction after great heat as the telescope shows in a much larger way on the face of the moon.

As this was considered the most distinguished visitor that had ever reached the earth from infinite space, it was presented as a mark of his distinguished consideration by Prof. Bonilla to William Earl Hidden, as one of the most distinguished American mineralogists, who was also an authority on meteors and meteoric minerals. Analysis showed that it was 91.26 per cent. iron, 7.84 per cent. nickel, 65-100 per cent. cobált, 30-100 per cent. phosphorus, with traces of sulphur, carbon and chlorine. Mr. Hidden wrote its history in the American Journal of Science. In the century Magazine of August, 1885, he answered the question, "Is it a piece of a comet?" by summing up the evidence in connection with the known history of Biela's lost comet, since it split in 1846 and returned as two comets in 1852, to disappear finally in what were supposed to be a swarm of "bielids.'

"At the time of the fall of this meteorite" (in Mexico), Hidden writes, "it was 10 hours after the maximum number of meteors was observed. The earth was meeting with only the stragglers of the train. It cannot be doubted that the cosmical dust proceeding from the disintegration of Biela's comet wholly enveloped the earth and was seen as meteors from every part of it. Such was the magnificence of the celestial phenomena in some parts of the eastern continent that some people believed there would be no more stars left in the sky."

Biela's comet had returned regularly in a period of a little less than seven yeads until it underwent complete shipwreck in the heavens. No one ever expects to see it again. The end, as far as known, is this star shower in the night the Bonilla bielid was picked up in Mazapil, to give us the best knowledge we have of what may be expected when a comet falls.

Biela's lost comet does not compare with Halley's, which must have billions of stones or small and large masses of matter, probably nickel-iron, in its magnificent head. If it were shipwrecked by Jupiter, by the earth or by any other planet, these, if they were drawn close enough by the planet to break the hold the sun has on them, may do a number of interesting things.

They might revolve around the earth at a distance, collecting in such a ring as that of Saturn, which is supposed to be composed of an infinite number of such stones, or they might whirl closer and closer in revolving around it until finally the largest of them, which do not burn up in the atmosphere by friction, must fall as this bielid fell in Mexico. The hope of getting a beautiful earth ring, such as that of Saturn's, by capturing comets, is very small, if only because comets have not matter enough in them to make it

A GOOD COUGH MIXTURE.

Simple Home-Made Remedy That Is Free from Opiates and Harmful Drugs.

An effective remedy that will usually break up a cold in twenty-four hours, is easily made by mixing together in a large bottle two ounces of Glycerine, a half-ounce of Virgin Oil of Pine compound pure and eight ounces of pure Whisky. This mixture will cure any cough that is curable, and is not expensive as it makes enough to last the average family an entire year. Virgin Oil of Pine compound pure is prepared only in the laboratories of the Leach Chemical Co., Cincinnati, O.

A NURSE'S EXPERIENCE.

Backache, Pains in the Kidneys, Bloating, Etc., Overcome.

A nurse is expected to know what to do for common ailments, and women who suffer backache, constant languor, and other common symptoms of kidney complaint, should be grateful to Mrs. Minnie Turner, of E. B. St., Anadarko, Okla., for pointing out the way to find quick relief. Mrs. Turner used Doan's Kidney Pills for a run-down condition, backache, pains in the sides and kidneys, bloated limbs, etc. "The way they have built me up is simply marvelous," says Mrs. Turner, who is a nurse. "My health improved rapidly. Five boxes did so much for me I am telling everybody about it."

Would Be No Change.

During the presidential campaign the question of woman suffrage was much discussed among women pro and con and at an afternoon tea the conversation turned that way between the women guests.

"Are you a woman suffragist?" asked the one who was not interested.

"Indeed, I am not," replied the other most emphatically.

"Oh, that's too bad, but just supposing you were, whom would you support in the present campaign?"

"The same man I've always supported, of course," was the apt reply—"my husband."

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam' Minn under th Act of Congress of March 3, 1879

Anyone living in this legislative district that is opposed to sending a banker to the legislature, should go down to Crookston and take a look at that Agricultural school, and see what banker A. D. Stephens done for that district.

The large amount of grain that is still standing in the stock in this part of the county might all been threshed if it was not so difficult for the machine to move. There is not a machine in this part of the country but has put in more time moving than they have threshing this fall.

Ole Sageng, the man that tried to plow his way into congress last year, hasquit the plow and gone into threshing machine deals, which is reported to be a "dusty job,"but Ole will get the dust of that machine brushed off next year,if he runs for congress.

That "old dead cat" of free homesteads on this reservation has again been dug up to be aird and shook up. Anyone that is at all familiar with the agreement under which these lands was opened is well aware of the fact that that there is no possibility of geting any act through congress to make free homesteads on this land. And yet you will hear some people make the remark, that Knut Nelson and Halvor Steenerson could have got this land opened free if they had wanted to, while as a matter of fact it was a hard proposition to get it opened at all. If there was any possibility to get a free homestead bill through congress for this land, Halvor Steenerson would not hesitate to put in an entire day making arguments for it, and Knut Nelson would put in another one in the senate. But Nelson and Steenerson are not the whole U.S.congress,but only a small part of it. It must be remembered that when the government bought this land, that they were not dealing with the North American Indian of two hundred years ago, but with a class of people that knew what the land was worth, and would not sell until they got their price. There was no deception in the buying of the land by the govenrmet, or the selling of it by them, the price was set, and you could buy or not, and whatever other faults congresman Steenerson may, or may not have he is certainly not to blame for not geting this land opened for free homested entry, as that was an impossibility.

Pilkerton Won the Race.

At one of the regattas of the National Association of American Oarsmen during the early nineties James Pilkerton, for many years the champion sculler of America, was matched to row double against another team. He and his mate were the champions, and the general belief was that they would win without effort. But the night before the regatta public opinion suddenly and mysteriously changed. Mr. Pilkerton knew that this was not caused by any new development of strength in his opponent or any loss of skill on his own part. After making some quiet inquiries he discovered that there was talk of his rowing mate having been bought up by the other side and of an arrangement to throw the race.

He didn't say anything about his suspicions, but when the two men were seated in the shell and were well out into the deep water he leaned over to his mate and said:

"Look here, you blooming cutthroat! You've got to swim, drown or win this race! You know me!" He won.

Love, like fortune, turns upon a wheel and is very much given to rising and falling.—Vanbrugh

HORRORS OF THE ARCTIC.

Terrible Experience of the Crew of the Ill Fated Jeannette.

When Ross in 1818 touched at Etah the Esks thought they were being visited by ghosts. With her white sails appearing on the horizon, where the sky melts into an abyss of ocean, what else could the ship be but some great white winged ghost, and what those strange creatures on her decks but lost souls? They thought she, a great bird, had flown from the moon, where wood was abundant, and when they saw her close, her wooden belly and her masts, they whispered, "How much wood there is in the moon, how very much!" Wood is like gold to the Esks.

One of the unhappy crew of the Jeannette writes: "I put some mercury to freeze and beat it out on the anvil. Our frozen brandy looked like black topaz. We divided meat, oil and bread with a hatchet. Joshua forgot to put on his right glove; in a moment his hand was frozen. The poor devil wished to thaw his lifeless hand in warm water. It was immediately covered with pieces of ice. The doctor was forced to cut the unlucky mate's hand off, and he died next day. Toward the middle of January a caravan of Esks came to ask us for some dried fish and brandy. We added a little tobacco to these presents, which they received with tears of joy. The chief, a feeble old man, told us that the week before he had eaten his wife and two sons."

Cold more terrible than the white wolf and bear seizes its victims unawares, instantaneously, fatally. The cold purifies the blood, sharpens appetite, favors digestion and stomach. It soothes to sleep by bringing death in the midst of beautiful dreams. This intense cold, so dry, so pure, stops putrefaction, sweetens the air by greatly increasing its density and purifies water. Cold takes the place of cooking, for it makes raw meat, raw fish and tallow eatable.

A Roman nosed people could not hold their own in the arctic. A Roman nose would be too often frozen off. The Esk flat nose is less exposed. The name Eskimo, or raw food eaters, is a nickname given by the Labrador Indians. Their true name in their own tongue is Inuit and means "man." If patriotism be a virtue the Esks have it surpassingly. Never was a land of verdant groves, golden harvests and willows mirrored in the streamlets and silvery waves better beloved than their snow fields and ice hills and gloomy, stinking tents and igloos.—New York Press.

Brother Goodsole's Mistake.

"Brother Goodsole," asked the Rev. K. Mowatt Laightly, "did you announce last Sunday that I would occupy your pulpit this morning?"

"Indeed, I did, Brother Laightly."

"Yet look at the smallness of the congregation. I can't account for it."—Chicago Tribune.

A Use For the Jail.

Winkleborough is a flourishing little seaside resort, and during the season almost every available room is let at good prices.

A visitor to that delightful spot last season was interested to observe a policeman soundly cuff a likely youth for some misdemeanor, and, curious to know the reason of the chastisement, he went over to the guardian of the peace.

"What's he done, constable?" inquired the visitor.

"Pickin' pockets, sir. Let me catch 'im at it agin an' I'll give 'im a rare good hidin'."

"But why didn't you run him in?"

"Run 'im in!" retorted the policeman. "Why, bless yer, we kin't runnin' anybody in this week. The p'lice station's let for lodgin's!"—London Answers.

PUZZLE OF THE AIR.

Changing Currents Shown by the Action of Birds in Flight.

The average person regards air much as he regards water—as much lighter, of course, but like it otherwise. Calm air is precisely to him as calm water in a pool. If there is a wind he pictures the air as a flowing river. And just so long as all men looked at it so, just so long the birds kept their monopoly, for the only state in which water approaches the condition of air is when water forms a maelstrom. Even then water in its wildest turbulence falls far short of the unstable, incessant agitation of the atmosphere. Air is never still. It is filled with warm waves ascending, cold waves descending, and through it race cross shoots and diagonal shoots, with corkscrew whirlwinds wandering hither and yon as they list. The warm air off a cornfield creates one kind of a disturbance; off plowed land it creates another. A layer of cold air may hold down a layer of warmer air. Consider what happens when the warm air breaks through its envelope as a millpond bursts its dam. A flowing stream churned to and fro and round and round and up and down would give a feeble idea of the air's inconstancy.

Now, a bird, circling with fixed wings, floats on a rising column of air. It maintains its altitude as to the earth, but it is constantly coasting down through the air's ascending volume. Once the bird loses the air column it has to flap its wings, and it flaps till it finds another column, when it goes on wheeling again with fixed wings. Moreover, when it flies the wind comes toward it in waves, rising and falling like the billows of the sea. It meets them, and then it does precisely what a boat does—goes over them or goes through them. The Wrights learned all this, and when they'd learned they were about as near to flying as you and I would be to writing Chinese philosophy when we'd just learned the English alphabet. Furthermore, there were no teachers, living or dead, that could help them more than a few steps along the way.—Everybody's Magazine.

FOUGHT WITH HIS BOYS.

An Amusing Passage Between Willich and Rosecrans.

There are times when the so called "red tape" of the army gives way under the stress of circumstances. At the battle of Chickamauga General Willich, who was commanding a brigade, incurred the displeasure of General Rosecrans, the commanding general, by some very slight omission. General Willich was sent for and informed by the general commanding that he must consider himself under arrest for the present.

"General," said Rosecrans sternly, "consider yourself under arrest and leave your sword here until your case is tried."

"Yes, general, I will consider myself under arrest," was the reply, "and just so soon as dis fight's over I'll come and fix him up."

"But, sir," said the astounded Rosecrans, "I want you to consider yourself under arrest now."

"Of course I do," responded Willich promptly, "and so zoon as I get off dis fight I'll be up and settle him."

"But, sir," expostulated the commanding general, "I can't let you go into this fight. You are under arrest. I will send an officer to your brigade."

"You send an officer to fight my boys!" cried Willich indignantly. "He can't do it. They don't know him. Me they know. I teach them. I fight them, and none of the boys would know how to fight or what to do only when I go with them. My boys belong to me; yes, me, General Willich. I command the brigade, and I must fight the brigade."

General Rosecrans gave it up. General Willich was requested to return and "fight his boys," which he did most successfully. And that was the end of the matter.—Youth's Companion.

They Don't Like Rain.

The tortoise shows a greater dislike to and fear of rain than any other animal. Twenty-four hours or more before rain falls the Galapagos tortoise makes for shelter. On a bright, clear morning, when not a cloud can be seen, all the shellbacks on a tortoise farm may sometimes be seen headed for the nearest overhanging rocks. When that happens the people know that rain will come down during the day, and, as a rule, it comes down in torrents. The sign never fails.

A few nights ago I went home, tired most to death, and during the evening I casually remarked: 'Iole, my business is getting most too much for me to handle. I am thinking of employing a nice, steady stenographer and typewriter. Don't you think it would be a good idea?' From that moment the good little woman has been extremely anxious to assist me and make my lot easier in every way. I suppose it's her naturally sympathetic nature. It must be."—Boston Herald.

A Brilliant Judge.

Steady Baker was at one time mayor of Folkestone, England. Once a boy was brought before him for stealing gooseberries, and Steady, aware of the importance of the case, turned over the pages of the alphabetically arranged "Burn's Justice" for a precedent. Failing to find one, he turned to the culprit. "My lad," said he, "it's lucky for you that you were not brought here for stealing a goose instead of for stealing gooseberries. There is a statute against stealing geese, but I can't find anything about gooseberries in all 'Burn,' so let the prisoner be discharged, for I suppose it is no offense."

NORMAN PEASANTS.

Their Bread Is Made in the Stables by the Men.

A farmer's wife in the north of France may do a good part of the heavy work about the farm, but she never thinks of making the bread. That is man's work, and it is carried on not in the kitchen, but in the stable.

The Norman peasant eats an astonishing quantity of bread. He has little else except cider for his breakfast and supper, and it is a very important part of his noonday meal as well.

And such queer looking bread as it is! The "loaves" are as round and as palely yellow as the full moon. They are often three feet in circumference and eight or ten inches thick. Seeing one of them for the first time, you would be likely to take it for a huge cheese.

Breadmaking being only a monthly occurrence in a Norman household, the operations must be on a scale of considerable magnitude if the family supply is to be sufficient to last for four weeks. The dough is always mixed in a certain inclosed space upon the floor of the barn.

At other times cats, dogs and poultry enjoy the freedom of this space but when breadmaking time comes these are evicted and the floor is swept- on its hope very thoroughly.

There is no dough pan or trough. The flour and water are poured together upon the floor, and the farmer and his sons or hired laborers beat the mass into the proper consistency with heavy clubs widely flattened at the ends until they look something like roughly shaped snow shovels. Then a lump of leaven is added, and the mass is given ten or twelve hours to "rise."

Next it must be kneaded, a process which is accomplished with the feet. Shod in heavy sabots, or wooden shoes—not the everyday shoes, which are painted black, but made of unstained whitewood the men leap into the midst of the dough. They jump about with agility; they stamp and kick the spongy stuff; they dance clumsy jigs in it, the stiffening dough clinging tenaciously to their shoes. It is the hardest of hard work, requiring endurance as well as strength, and before it is time to stop more than one of the men will be staggering to and fro in the pasty mass, thoroughly exhausted.

The dough is allowed to rise a second time, is again soundly beaten with the flattened clubs, is then put into great round pans and baked in the massive brick oven which stands in almost every Norman stable.

The bread which results is firm, close in texture and rather dinky in color, sweet, but dry, and decidedly palatable even to those who have seen it made.

As the month draws to a close the outer crust becomes so thick and hard that it can only be penetrated by a saw kept for that purpose. But this horny shell has its use, for it keeps the interior of the loaf fairly soft and fresh, sometimes for several months.—Youth's Companion.

How He Paid His Fine.

Pat Kelly, the owner of the only jaunting car in the village, went on a spree and was sentenced to a fine of 20 shillings or seven days in jail. Kelly chose the latter.

Now, the prison was ten miles away, and the only possible means of getting a prisoner there was by driving. As Kelly himself had the only car in the place, there was nothing to do but to hire it. For some time the constable and his prisoner haggled over the terms.

Kelly stuck out firmly for 30 shillings, to be paid in advance and at last the constable had to consent to the extortion. Accordingly they drove off and without any misadventures arrived at the prison. When they had alighted Kelly suddenly informed his companion that he had changed his mind, as the prison wasn't a decent looking place, and would pay the fine.

He thereupon drew out the 30 shillings he had received, counted out the 20 shillings and paid them over to the inspector. Then, jumping on his car, he drove away, leaving the constable to walk back.

Mistaken Identity

By ARTHUR M. KYLE

(Copyright, by W. G. Chapman.)

It was a very foggy day in New York. People went around telling each other that it was regular London weather, and numerous Anglo-maniacs hugged themselves with joy to think how "near the real British article our climate was."

But Lucy Walton, on the eve of her departure for foreign lands was more than disgusted at the existing weather conditions.

"It's perfectly beastly," she declared to her brother, who accompanied her to bid her bon voyage. "I have not been in New York for two years and can see nothing when I do get here. I fully intended to call on Elsie Gordon, but this horrid fog obstructs street traffic so that I might be delayed and miss the steamer. So I'll have to give Elsie up and I just long to see her. Think of being in the same town with a girl who was my most intimate friend at school for years and then not laying eyes on her."

"Lucy Walton," said her brother, with an air of mock severity, "you are perfectly incorrigible and I think—"

"Lucy Walton!" echoed a musical girlish voice, in evident astonishment. "Is it possible I am within reach of my long lost friend?"

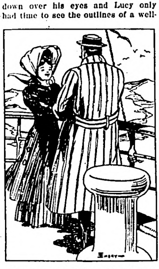
Lucy turned quickly. By an odd turn of Fortune's wheel the very girl she had been speaking of stood by her side. In an instant they were in each other's arms and chatting as though they were still schoolgirls.

"I'm just on my way to the steamer to sail for Merry Old England," said Lucy presently.

"For England!" exclaimed her friend excitedly. "What ship do you take?"

Lucy told her and Elsie clapped her hands in delight. "Brother Eddie is sailing on your ship, Lucy. Isn't that too delightful. Bob," she called, "come here at once and meet Miss Walton, who is to be your fellow passenger."

Out of the fog there advanced a tall figure clad in a long striped ulster. A soft hat was pulled well down over his eyes and Lucy only had time to see the outlines of a well-trained mustache when the fog came around them thicker than ever and she failed to get a good look at the features of Edward Gordon. The striped ulster, however, being of a singularly loud design, impressed itself on her memory and she told herself that she would easily recognize Elsie's brother by that conspicuous garment when she met him on shipboard. After hurried good-bys, the Waltons and Gordons separated and in due course of time the vessel carrying Lucy and Edward among its passengers steamed out across the broad Atlantic. For two days Lucy remained in the seclusion of her stateroom, but seasickness does not last forever, especially if the patient be possessed of a fair amount of will power. So on the morning of the third day she ventured upon deck, presenting a very attractive appearance in her natty sailor suit. Almost the first thing that attracted her attention was the sight of the well-remembered ulster, resplendent in its gorgeous stripes.



"Good Morning," She Said, Brightly.

"Ah, there is Elsie's brother," she said to herself. "I'll not be lonely any more. Wonder why he doesn't come up and speak to me?"

The young gentleman, however, continued to stare straight ahead of him over the tumbling masses of green water.

"He hasn't seen me," thought Lucy. "But what's the use of being shy with Elsie's brother, whom I already seem to know so well. Why, Elsie was never tired singing his praises. I'll simply go up and speak to him."

Acting on this impulse, she crossed directly to where the object of her reverie was standing and greeted him with a smile.

"Good morning," she said brightly. The gentleman bowed rather stiffly, and then a faint smile crept around the corners of his mouth as he returned her salutation. They exchanged a few commonplaces about the voyage and finally Lucy said:

"You don't know how glad I am that you are on board, for I have heard so much about you that I feel as though we were old friends. And you are just what I fancied you would be."

She did not observe that his eyebrows went up a little in evident surprise, but kept on talking.

"Are you going to be in London long?" she asked.

"Well, yes, for the season, of course," he answered. The conversation languished until Lucy remarked laughingly. "I'm afraid I may not like the English if one is to believe the joke artists of our country. For instance, must one believe the popular legend that Englishmen make their wives black their boots for them. Just fancy! You wouldn't find an American girl that would do it."

Her companion broke into a laugh. "Well, really," he responded, "I can't say y' know, for as it happens I know very little—"

An exclamation of surprise from Lucy interrupted him, and following her gaze he saw a young fellow, much like himself in build and wearing a gayly striped ulster, an exact duplicate of the one he wore himself. The newcomer hesitated a moment and then came forward to Lucy, casting a perplexed look at her companion, who appeared to be his own double.

"Miss Walton—I think?" he asked, inquiringly.

Lucy turned from one to the other in confusion. For the life of her she could not tell which man it was that she had met on that foggy afternoon in New York. The ulster was no longer a distinguishing mark, nor was the close-trimmed mustache, for both men laid claim to both of the articles in question. Yet surely she knew but one of them, and if the last comer was Edward Gordon who then was the man she had accosted? As she stood in bewilderment, her cheeks aflame with blushes, the latest arrival gravely drew forth a card case and presented a neat square of pasteboard bearing the name—Edward M. Gordon. Following his example the other produced a case on which a crest was stamped and handed Lucy his card. The name engraved thereon was simply Cecil Versey, but she recognized it instantly as belonging to a young English earl who had been making a tour of the states. The revelation of the stranger's identity came rather as a shock to Lucy, but withal she could hardly keep from smiling over the absurd position in which her own impulsiveness had placed her. There was nothing to do but accept the situation calmly. Lucy explained her mistake in a few words and in a short time the members of the trio were chatting pleasantly together.

"Tell me," she asked Versey, when she encountered him on the following day, "what you thought of my boldness?"

"I thought you were a very charming girl," responded the Englishman, gallantly.

Lucy passed the compliment by. "But what did you think when I began to converse with you?" she persisted.

"Well," replied Versey, laughing, "I thought it might be a new custom of the states to ignore conventionalities. You know there are odd customs everywhere."

"Now you are thinking about my boot story," remonstrated Lucy; "but you must believe me when I say I am not going to allow any absurd prejudices on the part of some of my countrymen to influence me against the English."

"I am very glad of that," he responded, with so much warmth that Lucy was glad that Edward Gordon joined them just then.

It chanced that Miss Walton visited some people in London who were also friends of Versey's, and they were much together. Before her visit came to an end she had the opportunity of becoming Lady Versey, had she so desired. But although the marriage would have brought her not only a title but great wealth, Lucy refused the earl. And on her return home she became the wife of Edward Gordon, the owner of the original striped ulster which had proved a deceptive guide in the beginning of things.

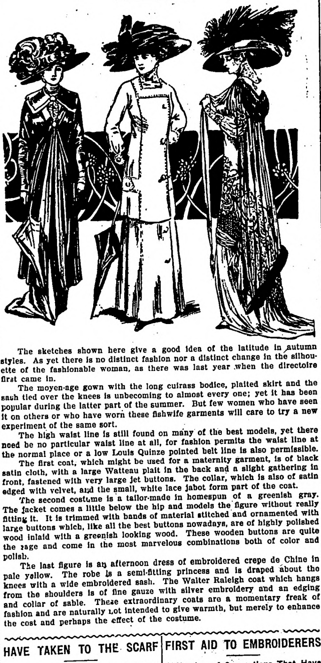
The Spread of Fashion.

English court, with regard to fashion, began regularly truckling to Paris as early as the sixteenth century. Modern fashion began in courts and has gradually spread to the lowliest homes until now even the poorest struggling girls of Paris, Berlin and New York must follow it, even if it is only in some cheap penny trumpery imitation. A true aesthetic and scientific fashion in clothing is among life's most necessary cultures and blessings, but modern madcap mimicry is as injurious as demoralizing. Still it is no worse than the insanities of man's fashions during the middle ages. Indeed, there are foolish old men and silly young fellows who are just as absurd about dress as any woman, and can think and talk of little else. Lots of ignorant, over-dressed men sit up and survey each other from head to foot after the manner of worse bred women.

Air Filter.

Prof. Charles Richet of Paris has devised a means for purifying the air in rooms. His apparatus is an air filter which mechanically sterilizes air. Very fine drops of glycerine are scattered along the walls of a cylinder containing a suction fan. Each particle of air drawn in by the fan is freighted with glycerine and hence tends to drop, thereby carrying with it the germs, dust and microbes with which it may be laden.

Autumn Styles



The sketches shown here give a good idea of the latitude in autumn styles. As yet there is no distinct fashion nor a distinct change in the silhouette of the fashionable woman, as there was last year when the directoire first came in.

The moyen-age gown with the long cuirass bodice, plaited skirt and the sash tied over the knees is unbecoming to almost every one; yet it has been popular during the latter part of the summer. But few women who have seen it on others or who have worn these fishwife garments will care to try a new experiment of the same sort.

The high waist line is still found on many of the best models, yet there need be no particular waist line at all, for fashion permits the waist line at the normal place or a low Louis Quinze pointed belt line is also permissible.

The first coat, which might be used for a maternity garment, is of black satin cloth, with a large Watteau plait in the back and a slight gathering in front, fastened with very large jet buttons. The collar, which is also of satin edged with velvet, and the small, white lace jabot form part of the coat.

The second costume is a tailor-made in homespun of a greenish gray. The jacket comes a little below the hip and models the figure without really fitting it. It is trimmed with bands of material stitched and ornamented with large buttons which, like all the best buttons nowadays, are of highly polished wood inlaid with a greenish looking wood. These wooden buttons are quite the rage and come in the most marvelous combinations both of color and polish.

The last figure is an afternoon dress of embroidered crepe de Chine in pale yellow. The robe is a semi-fitting princess and is draped about the knees with a wide embroidered sash. The Walter Raleigh coat which hangs from the shoulders is of fine gauze with silver embroidery and an edging and collar of sable. These extraordinary coats are a momentary freak of fashion and are naturally not intended to give warmth, but merely to enhance the cost and perhaps the effect of the costume.

HAVE TAKEN TO THE SCARF

Accessory of Early Victorian Days Received with Favor By the Fashionable.

One of the prettiest pieces of drapery that one can own this winter is the early Victorian scarf about three yards long, made of chiffon cloth on which are narrow bands of fur or marabou.

They are a trifle over a yard wide. They are worn across the shoulders, and the ends drop over the arms. If one is tall it is not amiss to have a scarf, the ends of which reach to the hem of the skirt.

For evening these are made in vivid colors, and for afternoons they are in black, taupe, deep violet, and several shades of gray.

One of the most effective is of black chiffon cloth run with strips of ermine. This is worn with a princess gown of white broadcloth and a poke bonnet of black velvet, with large crown, surrounded by upstanding black tips. From the back are two streamers of black velvet that fall to the floor.

Older women, and those in mourning, will wear the long scarfs of black chiffon cloth banded with black lynx.

Naturally these will not be worn over coats, no matter how elaborate the latter may be. They will be used with one-piece gowns, and would look absurd over a skirt with a separate blouse. There is not much danger, however, of the latter being adopted this year, except for strictly informal wear. The white blouse is confined this season within narrow limitations. This fact alone may somewhat reduce the exaggerated prices for it. It also should go without saying that the long, sweeping scarf should not be worn with a small, jaunty hat. It needs a hat with a brim. It is not "in the picture" with a Russian toque.

Rules for Social Success.

Be yourself. Don't imitate some one else.

Be as nice to women as you are to men.

Be cordial to older men and women.

Be natural. Forget yourself.

Don't let one man monopolize you.

Look as though you were having a good time, even if you are not.

Make every man feel that you appreciate his courtesies. Don't gush over them or over him.

Don't spend your time in corners with a man. Stay out in the open.

Never fail to pay all your calls.

Let nothing prevent you from being prompt.

Collapsible Stoves.

After dire experience with cold rooms, a woman who travels now includes in her baggage one of the collapsible stoves used by hunters.

These are quite small affairs that are packed into a leather case and add little to the weight of baggage. They can be put up quickly, and not only give added warmth, but may be used for extra cooking.

FIRST AID TO EMBROIDERERS

A Number of Suggestions That Have Been Proved to Be Essential to Good Work.

Be careful in your choice of needles. Avoid one that is too small, for the thread wears it thin and roughens it.

Mercerized cottons can be used with an ordinary needle of the right size; a crewel needle is best for silk.

In choosing a crewel needle take those with oval eyes and rather short. They can be bought in mixed packages. Keep such a package in the work bag, that you need not fall back on the wrong kind of needle.

An emery is even more important in embroidery than in ordinary sewing. A sticky needle makes one pull at the work in a way fatal to smoothness.

A stiletto should form part of the equipment of every embroidery bag. Those of ivory never rust the material. There is a new stiletto with a gauge that insures even sized holes.

When doing a piece of work that will not wash, paste tissue paper over the part that is finished and keep it rolled up, with the embroidery inside.

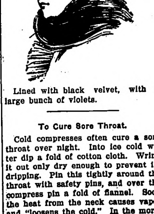
A white apron and hands that are frequently washed are big helps in keeping work clean.

Be careful in doing silk embroidery too near a window or out of doors, where soot and dust blow on it.

Wash a buttonholed edge if possible before it is cut out. It makes a firmer edge and is less apt to ravel.

In laundering colored embroideries do it yourself, unless your laundress not only knows how, but is willing to take time and trouble.

BLACK MOIRE HAT.



Lined with black velvet, with a large bunch of violets.

To Cure Sore Throat.

Cold compresses often cure a sore throat over night. Into ice cold water dip a fold of cotton cloth. Wring it out only dry enough to prevent its dripping. Pin this tightly around the throat with safety pins, and over the compress pin a fold of flannel. Soon the heat from the neck causes vapor and "loosens the cold." In the morning remove the compress and massage the neck with olive oil.

WANTS HER LETTER PUBLISHED

For Benefit of Women who Suffer from Female Ills

Minneapolis, Minn.—"I was a great sufferer from female troubles which caused a weakness and broken down condition of the system. I read so much of what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound had done for other suffering women I felt sure it would help me, and I must say it did help me wonderfully. My pains all left me, I grew stronger, and within three months I was a perfectly well woman.

"I want this letter made public to show the benefit women may derive from Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound."—Mrs. JOHN G. MOLDAN, 2115 Second St., North, Minneapolis, Minn.

Thousands of unsolicited and genuine testimonials like the above prove the efficiency of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, which is made exclusively from roots and herbs.

Women who suffer from those distressing ills peculiar to their sex should not lose sight of these facts or doubt the ability of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to restore their health.

If you want special advice write to Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass. She will treat your letter as strictly confidential. For 20 years she has been helping sick women in this way, free of charge. Don't hesitate—write at once.

WESTERN CANADA

What Prof. Shaw, the Well-Known Agriculturist, Says About It:

160 ACRE FARMS IN WESTERN CANADA FREE

"I would sooner raise cattle in Western Canada than in the corn belt of the United States. Feed is cheaper and climate better for the purpose. Your market will improve faster than your farmers will produce the supplies. Wheat can be grown up to the 60th parallel (800 miles north of the International boundary). SETS NOVEMBER 25 AS THE DAY

Says We Have Abundant Material Reasons For Returning Thanks This Year.

St. Paul.—Governor Adolph O. Eberhart issued his Thanksgiving proclamation, naming Thursday, Nov. 25, as the day of general praise and thanks. The document, which is the first by the new governor, reads:

"The people of this state are ever mindful of the source from which come all their blessings. Cosmopolitan as they are, blending here the blood, the heart, and conscience of all that is best in old-world civilization, they approach the Thanksgiving period with sincere appreciation that "All good cometh from on High."

"Of material reasons for spiritual thanksgiving and praise there are abundant causes—our unity as a people, our enjoyments of peace, our increasing opportunities for industrial advancement, our splendid school system that guarantees to every child the right to liberal educational advantages, our peaceful journeys in the direction of higher ideals of civilization and society. These are blessings that our people will do well to remember and to raise their voices in praise and gratitude therefor. Let us each and everyone, whether in the quiet of our homes or in the places of public worship, give thanks to Almighty God for these, our privileges and blessings, and with fervent resolution and reverent mien let us justify the faith of our fathers by consecrating ourselves anew on this autumnal day to service in the cause of the Great Giver.

"Thankful, indeed, that fire and flood have not devastated our dominion, that public health and public morals are both on a high plane, that our harvests are not only bountiful, but our products command a premium in the marts of the world, we of Minnesota should give thanks for these signs of the heavenly beneficence and devote ourselves to works of highest attainment, not forgetting that through service to others is the road to individual happiness and the accomplishment of the ideal.

"Now, therefore, I, Adolph O. Eberhart, governor of the state of Minnesota, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the laws of the state and the custom honored since the admission of the state to the union, do hereby appoint Thursday, the 25th day of November, in the year nineteen hundred and nine, as a day of general Thanksgiving.

"Done at the capitol in the city of St. Paul, this twelfth day of November in the year nineteen hundred and nine.

"ADOLPH O. EBERHART,
Governor.

"Attest:
"Julius A. Schmahl,
"Secretary of State."

EIGHT PERSONS POISONED.

Children at Play Mixed Arsenic With Baking Powder.

Montgomery.—Joseph Edel, a farmer, and his seven children are sick from arsenic poisoning. Some time ago the children, in the absence of their parents, found a package of arsenic which had been placed behind a clock by Mr. Edel after he had used some of it for a horse. The children, thinking it baking powder, emptied it into the baking powder can in the pantry. On Wednesday, Mrs. Edel used it in making biscuits, of which Mr. Edel and the seven children ate freely.

Mrs. Edel did not eat any of the biscuits, as she did not sit down with the rest of the family, but was waiting upon them and doing other work about the kitchen. Everything is being done to save their lives, but as yet the physician cannot tell what the outcome will be.

FARMERS INSTITUTES ARE BUSY.

Successful One Held at Hibbing Yesterday.

Hibbing.—The disagreeable weather did not deter many farmers from coming to town to attend the farmer's institute. The institute opened in the morning and held afternoon and evening meetings.

F. B. McLeren, of Wrenshall, who had charge of the Institute at Cook, was again in charge, aided by C. E. Brown of Elk River; H. K. Larson, of Bernier; A. B. Hostetter, of Duluth, and others, who addressed the assemblage upon farming topics. Today the institute will be held at Eveleth, where the Commercial club is also planning to royally welcome the visitors.

NEARLY SINKS IN HARBOR.

Steamer Odanah in Trouble at Duluth.

Duluth.—While trying to leave the harbor, loaded with ore for Lake Erie, in the heavy gales, the steamer Odanah of the Pickands-Mather Company hit the north pier of the Duluth ship canal and stove in her bow. The vessel had to be beached on the shore of Park Point to prevent her sinking. Divers are ascertaining the extent of the damage.

MINNESOTA'S WEALTH LEAPS.

Bank Deposits Increase $90,000,000 in Two Years.

The most remarkable statement of financial conditions in the Northwest that has ever been published is contained in a compilation made by the Security National bank, of Minneapolis, copies of which have been placed in the hands of all the leading financiers of the country.

It discloses that the bank deposits of Minnesota have increased in two years over $90,000,000; that the bank deposits of Iowa, in the same period, have increased almost $90,000,000, and that the deposits of North Dakota and South Dakota show, respectively, increases of $19,000,000 and $25,000,000 in the two-year period.

Such a showing of potential wealth in the Northwest is a surprise even to financial men who have followed the developments in all lines of activity. For the last year or two the Northwest has been in the position of a money lender, its money has sought investment in other sections and few demands have been made upon the East for the financing of Northwestern enterprises.

The reason is manifest in a study of the comparative tables prepared by the Security National bank. The figures show the deposits in state and national banks on about Sept. 1, or as near that date as the bank call will permit. For the four states named, the total deposits at the beginning of September, 1909, are as follows:

Iowa, $372,575,000; Minnesota, $269,948,000; South Dakota, $78,830,000; North Dakota, $58,753,000. The deposits in the four states exceed $780,000,000.

Tremendous Development.

A thorough appreciation of the tremendous development in the Northwest in the last few years is secured by an examination of the comparative tables for the four states accompanying which show deposits for a period of 12 years. The steady growth that marked the earlier years has been followed by a jump in deposits during the last two years that almost exceeds belief. Minnesota's deposits increased $74,000,000 and Iowa's $76,000,000 in the last year. This increase was accompanied by only a normal increase in the number of banks.

The Northwest is now in a position where it finances its annual crop movement practically without outside financial help. It is apparent from the inquiries that are being directed toward the Twin Cities by outside investors of capital, and the interest manifested in the Northwest by the greatest masters of industry and transportation in the country, that new riches are to be poured into the country tributary to Minneapolis, in the shape of increased railroad development and added industrial activities.

WON'T SELL TO INDIANS.

Prosecutions Will Start If Pledges are Violated.

While people in the northern part of the state have been led to believe that the department of the inetrior has stopped all attempt to get evidence against liquor dealers selling intoxicants to Indians, secretary of the Prohibition party has received official notice that special officers have been at work steadily since the first prosecutions and information, sufficient to convict, has been obtained against five dealers at Grand Marais, one of the points at which the illegal trade is said to have centered.

Three officers arrived at that village, which is located on the north shore of Lake Superior in Cook county, about Nov. 1. Aided by residents of the town who had entered complaints, evidence against the places selling to Indians was quickly gathered. In accordance with the policy of the department of the interior, the saloonkeepers were called to the court house and confronted with the evidence.

Instead of starting the prosecution, the special officers presented a complete set of conditions, which bound the dealers not to sell intoxicants to the Indians or to allow Indians in their saloons or barrooms and to immediately give information against any person doing so.

The signatures of every saloonkeeper and bartender in Grand Marais was obtained to the document. This was then sent to headquarters, with the evidence which had been obtained.

MRS. LEDBETER ENTERS PLEA.

Says Not Guilty to Indictment Charging Murder.

Mankato.—Mrs. Grace Ledbeter pleaded not guilty to the indictment charging her with murder in the first degree. Frank Smith's attorney submitted a motion to dismiss the indictment and discharge the defendant, on the ground that W. R. Geddes, one of the witnesses examined by the grand jury in finding the indictment, was previously attorney for Smith, and that his evidence was gained from Smith as such attorney.

Students Judging Cattle.

South St. Paul.—A feature of interest to the Northwestern Live Stock show in South St. Paul was the students' judging contest in which the students of the various agricultural colleges of the Northwest were afforded an opportunity to show the practical value of their college training. This contest took place after the opening addresses by President C. N. Cosgrove of the Northwestern Live Stock Association and President C. P. Craig of the Minnesota Live Stock Breeders' Association.

JEFFRIES IS FAVORITE; ODDS ARE FICTITIOUS

No Reason Why White Man Should Be Two to One This Early in the Game.

Jeffries and Johnson are now tied up with theatrical dates and the public may expect their press agents to keep it informed of their doings, some real, some otherwise. One of the first was about a boxing bout between Jeffries and Sam Berger in which Sam blacked the former champion's eye. Usually the blacking is done by the hero, but this time the press agent fixed it up so that he could show Berger hiding from the "alfalfa king" for 20 minutes until he obtained a promise that Jeff wouldn't kill him.

Johnson and his auto speed mania is good for an item about twice a week. The big black has a 72-mile an hour machine. Some judge will send him to jail one of these days and Johnson will cut out the speed business. He cares nothing for a $100 fine and delights in peeling a century note off a big roll containing four or five thousand dollars and paying his fine.

Even with the proposed bout approximately eight months distant the question of betting on the result has already been taken up. The day the articles were signed the Johnson side refused to make the large side bet on the ground that "Jeffries will probably be a 2-to-1 favorite, and we want ring-side odds."

Why should Jeff be such a ridiculous favorite? Six years will have elapsed since he engaged in a battle. While the preliminary training he has indulged in the past fe wmonths may have encouraged him and his manager, Berger, to believe he could "come back," it is entirely too early to tell much about it. Remember that, as a rule, they don't "come back" after a long period of idleness, and many a star has tried it.

Don't bet a dollar on the bout either way at this early date. No matter what price is quoted, the odds will be fictitious. It will be impossible to quote a safe price either way until it is known how good Jeffries can get. This cannot be found out until he has been in training several weeks.

ONE OF ILLINOIS' STARS.

Hull, who plays center for the Urbana boys, did good work during the season and aided materially in the victories scored by the orange and blue. He showed well in kicking goals from touchdowns.

Wants "Jiggs" for Manager.

If a satisfactory price can be agreed upon "Jiggs" Donahue, former first baseman of the Chicago American league team and now belonging to the Minneapolis club of the American association, will manage the Dayton Central league team in 1910. The new backers of the Dayton team desire to make it a strong one and are seeking Donahue as its leader. Efforts were made to secure Billy Smith, late of Atlanta, but he preferred a berth in the Eastern league.

Daly's Protest Is Not Upheld.

Alfredo de Oro, who was awarded the referee's decision in a series of games with John Daly of Chicago for the world's championship honors in three-cushion-carom billiards, was finally upheld when a committee dismissed a protest filed by Daly that De Oro had used a ball not sanctioned by the rules.

Oral Betting Not Illegal.

The New York bookmakers won a great victory in the court of appeals when a decision was handed down in the cases of Orlando Jones and Sol Lichtenstein, holding that oral betting on horse races is not a violation of the law which was passed at the instance of Gov. Hughes.

Chance Wants Right Hander.

"With one more right-hander able to take his turn with Overall, Brown and Reulbach, the Cubs should bag the National league pennant in 1910," said Manager Chance before leaving Chicago for the coast.

HE DISCOVERED THE CULPRIT

Announcement of School Principal Not at All Comforting to the Teacher.

One of the women teachers went to the principal of a school in Queen's borough the other day. "Mr. Mark," she said, "I think you had better go upstairs. A substitute teacher is on duty up there, and I am afraid she is having a terrible time. The noise is so terrific the children down here scarcely can study."

The principal went up the stairs two steps at a time, and the noise soon ceased. When he returned to the lower room his face was grim. "Miss Henderson," he said, "if you hear any more of those noises let me know at once."

"Indeed I will," she replied. "It is simply outrageous that parents should bring their children up so they will behave that way. Did you find out who the children were?"

"Yes, I found out," the principal said, scowlingly. "One is your nephew and the other is my son," he replied, and the woman teacher almost collapsed.—New York Press.

Eating for Strength.

The greatest pleasure to be derived from eating is the pleasure one gets in the knowledge that his food is giving him greater strength and vitality.

Because of this fact there is a constant increase in the consumption of Quaker Oats; every time the strength making qualities of Quaker Oats have been tested by scientific investigation or by experiments in families it has been found to be a food without an equal.

It builds the muscles and brain without taxing the digestive organs; it costs so little anyone can afford it, and it is so carefully prepared and packed that it is absolutely pure and clean. A Quaker Oats eating family is always a healthy family. 11

Quaker Oats is packed in regular size packages and also in large size family packages. The latter very convenient for those not near the store.

Ready for the End.

The rector and a farmer were discussing the subject of pork one day and the rector displayed considerable interest in a pen of good-sized Berkshires. "Those pigs of yours are in fino condition, Tomkinson," he remarked. "Yes, sur; they be," replied the matter-of-fact farmer. "Ah, sur, if we was all of us only as fit to die as they be, sur, we'd do."—London News.

Silence!
The instinct of modesty natural to every woman is often a great hindrance to the cure of womanly diseases. Women shrink from the personal questions of the local physician which seem indelicate. The thought of examination is abhorrent to them, and so they endure in silence a condition of disease which surely progresses from bad to worse.
It has been Dr. Pierce's privilege to cure a great many women who have found a refuge for modesty in his offer of FREE consultation by letter. All correspondence is held as sacredly confidential. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

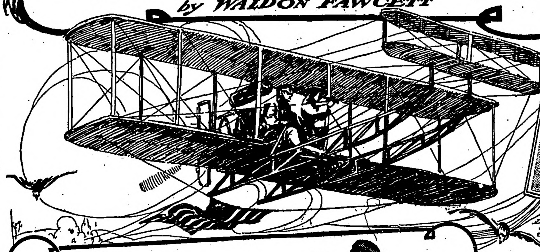
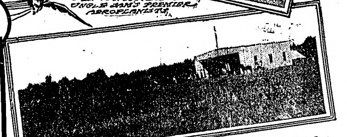
UNCLE SAM'S AEROPLANE SQUAD

by WALDON FAWCETT

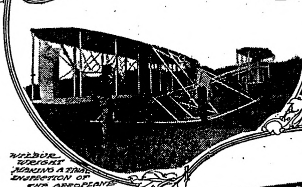


LIEUT. LAHM, & LT. HUMPHRIES, UNCLE SAM'S PREMIER AEROPLANISTS.

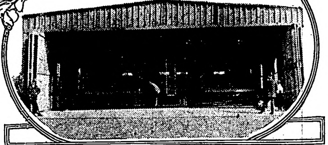
THE AEROPLANE SQUAD



THE NEW U. S. GOV'T. AVIATION FIELD AT COLLEGE PARK, MARYLAND



WILBUR WRIGHT MAKING A FINAL INSPECTION OF THE AEROPLANE



THE AEROPLANE SHED AT THE NEW AVIATION FIELD.

WITH the establishment of a United States government aviation field at College Park, Md., a brand new branch of the regular army has come into its own. This latest innovation in Uncle Sam's military establishment is an aeroplane squad, or, as it is designated officially, the aeroplane detachment of the United States signal corps. The signal corps has had for more than a year past a balloon squad or balloon detachment made up of enlisted men of the signal corps, who devote their entire time to aeronautical work, but the new organization is separate and quite apart from this. Indeed, it is generally considered to represent a higher development of military specialization, in the same proportion that the aeroplane marks an advance over the balloon as an instrument for use in warfare.

The new aeroplane detachment, which at the outset numbers only 11 men, or rather a corporal and 10 privates, is further notable from the fact that it is the first organization of the kind in the world. The American war department has been severely criticised for being behind the military departments of certain foreign governments, particularly France and Germany, in aeronautical investigation and experiment, but it has now, in some degree, made up for lost prestige by inaugurating the first full-fledged aeroplane corps. The federal government's new aviation field is, for the time being, as much a school of instruction for the men of the aeroplane squad as it is for the two lieutenants who are to qualify as the army's pioneer aviators. There is this difference, however, that the men, in effect, have to work out their own salvation as aeroplane mechanicians and aerodrome keepers, while Lieut. Lahm and Lieut. Humphries had a competent instructor in the person of Wilbur Wright to teach them the alphabet of aeroplaning.

Army officers are already congratulating themselves that the new aeroplane squad was organized at the very outset of the army's experiments in this most important branch of aeronautics. The outcome is sure to be in contrast to the history of American military ballooning, wherein there were innumerable disappointments. Particularly was this the case during the Spanish-American war, when the war department sought to get results with war balloons in the hands of men who had had no opportunity to specialize in this unusual line of work. The newly-organized aeroplane detachment, on the other hand, will grow up in our military aeroplane work from its inception. What is more, these caretakers of the sky sentries have acquired experience of the most valuable kind in establishing Uncle Sam's first aviation field. It is not meant, of course, that the soldiers had much hand in clearing the field, blasting out stumps or erecting the unpretentious shed that shelters the $30,000 craft, but they did almost everything else connected with setting things in order, not forgetting the transportation of army aeroplane No. 1 by wagon from its previous resting place at Fort Myer, Va., a dozen miles away. The insight thus gained into the how of such things will be well nigh invaluable, since it will make it possible to send this squad around the country to lay out aviation fields wherever needed by the army.

While, as has been explained, the new aeroplane detachment is entirely separate and distinct from the balloon squad, its brief history is linked at many points with that of the older branch of the aeronautical division. Some of the star members of the original balloon squad have latterly been transferred to the aeroplane detachment and indeed the new organization will have a sort of a dual existence as a regular aeroplane corps and emergency balloon squad, since the members will have charge of any flights that may be made from the capital in signal corps balloons, the regular balloon squad having been transferred meanwhile to Fort Omaha and Fort Leavenworth. The present membership of the aeroplane detachment, alike to that of the balloon squad, is expected to be merely the nucleus for a much more numerous body later on—when Uncle Sam shall have gone in more extensively for military aeronautics.

The aeronautical division of the signal corps, of which both the new aeroplane detachment and the balloon squad are branches, was established as a result of the pride and interest aroused by Lieut. Lahm's victory in the first great international balloon race, held in Europe in 1896. The young American army officer, then barely 28 years of age, who, unknown and unheralded, defeated the most experienced aeronauts of Europe, is the selfsame Lahm who is now qualifying at College Park as our premier army aeroplanist and who is in general command of the aeroplane detachment. He had made about 40 balloon flights ere he ascended for the first time in an aeroplane and he has the complete confidence of his men—an important requisite in a new and untried realm such as military aeronautics.

The order formally creating the aeronautical division of the signal corps was issued on August 1, 1907, and the new organization was launched with a membership of a sole individual, Sergeant Edward Ward, who has since graduated to the position of head chauffeur for the chief of the general staff. Gradually the membership grew to a dozen or more. At first the work of the new organization was merely with the old balloons of foreign make which had been purchased by the United States during the Spanish war and had been in storage ever since. Then came army dirigible No. 1, which the war department purchased from Capt. Thomas Baldwin, and finally the initial Wright aeroplane, which is now at College Park. At the outset the headquarters of the aeronautical division were at Fort Myer, Va., and the noncommissioned officers and enlisted men of the aeronautical division displayed their versatility by handling indiscriminately spherical balloons, dirigible and aeroplane.

When the signal corps completed its fine, new plant for generating hydrogen gas at Fort Omaha it was decided to make the western post the headquarters for all army balloon work and the dirigible was transferred thither. With it went the balloon squad. Consequently, when the Wright aeroplane was accepted by the government and preparations were undertaken for establishing a government school for aeroplanists, it was necessary to organize an aeroplane detachment as a new adjunct. As has been explained, some of the most capable men were transferred from the balloon squad and others were selected from the ranks of the signal corps, every effort being made to pick men who by reason of training or temperament may be expected to develop into genuine specialists in the work.

Much of the work which the men of the aeroplane detachment are doing at College Park represents brand new experience to them. Several of the members of the detachment have been working around this same airship for more than a year past, or throughout all the trial and test flights at Fort Myer, but their participation then was very different from their present responsibilities. So long as the aeroplane was the property of the Wright brothers all the United States signal corps men were permitted to do was to wheel the machine from the shed to the starting point of a flight and to wheel it back to the shelter after a flight. The starting of the motor, all adjustments of the mechanism and such repairs as were necessary from time to time were attended to by the Wrights in person or by Charles Taylor, their mechanic.

Now, however, that the flying machine has been turned over to the government, all this devolves upon the men of the aeroplane detachment. They look after the weight tower, haul up the weight and arrange the starting rail with due reference to the direction of the wind. In addition to moving the machine from the shed when a flight is ordered they make the preliminary inspection and tests of the working parts and start the motor. Finally it falls to the lot of this group of young men to procure the needed material and make all necessary repairs. There is no doubt that they will get plenty of practice in tinkering with the sky scout for it is expected that once the army officers have the new vehicle to themselves they will inaugurate a series of experiments and introduce new attachments designed specially to adapt the aeroplane to the exigencies of military service.

The members of the aeroplane detachment are decidedly alert and take a real interest in their noval occupation. Corporal H. Marcus, who is in command, hails from Detroit and has been in the military service of the country for 12 or 13 years, although he has only been in the signal corps about a year and a half. Another man who has had considerable experience in the army is B. T. Hyde of Washington, D. C., whereas E. O. Eldred of Denver, a member of the old balloon squad, has now had two and a half years of practically continuous aeronautical work. Other members of the aeroplane detachment are Bert Brown of Brooklyn, Roy J. Hart of Washington, D. C., Eulie P. Gomeringer of Brooklyn, K. L Kintzel of Tamaqua, Pa., Bruce Pierce of Atlanta, Ga., F. G. Clark of Gloster, Mo., and S. J. Idzorek of New York City.

The boys have their own cook in the person of William A. Abolin, who enlisted in the army from Jersey City, and while the quarters which have been provided at the new aviation field are not perhaps quite as comfortable as the barracks at a military post, they serve the purpose very acceptably and are a big improvement over a camp with canvas tents. The frame building which houses the aeroplane at College Park is about twice as large as the aeroplane shed which was constructed at Fort Myer, Va., when the Wrights first brought their machine there. The rear portion of the College Park structure is given over for sleeping quarters for the men. Just back of the building is a double tent, which serves as kitchen and mess or eating tent. A good well has been provided close at hand. The aeroplane shed is perhaps a third of a mile across the aviation field from the railroad station at College Park and is several hundred yards farther distant from the trolley line to Washington. However, horses and automobiles are employed by the army officers to cover the distance quickly and the enlisted men have the use of a motor cycle, a type of vehicle which is fast coming to have an important place in the activities of the signal corps.

By reason of weather conditions and other circumstances there will be many days when aeroplane flights at College Park will be few and far between, but the men of the aeroplane detachment will have something to occupy their leisure time on such occasions. Foremost among the occupations planned is practice in telegraphy. All of the men of the signal corps are expected to know something of the practical side of telegraphy and this accomplishment will be especially essential to the members of the aeroplane detachment because of the important work in wireless and other telegraphy which the United States army officers propose to carry on by means of airships and war balloons. In order to qualify the men for this work, short telegraph lines have been constructed at the College Park field, with sending and receiving stations at opposite ends of the building and at almost any hour of the day members of the detachment can be found at the keys at these stations.

How late in the autumn the aeronautical activities will continue at College Park will be dependent of course largely upon the weather. The government has leased its aviation field until next March, with privilege of renewal and in the event that the coming winter is an open one it would not be surprising if work continues off and on all through the winter. The men of the aeroplane detachment can be made comfortable in their presentent quarters, and the machine is well housed. The experience which the members of the aeroplane detachment are gaining will undoubtedly prove valuable in enabling them to take charge of the field when the next international aviation meet is held in this country next year as the result of the victory of Glenn Curtiss in France a few months ago.

It will be remembered that the United States army balloon squad did efficient work in connection with aeronautics at the Jamestown exposition and at the start of the great international balloon race at St. Louis. The same proficiency could be expected of the army aeroplanists in handling the machines at the meet next year. Especially would they be qualified to render such aid to the avaiators if the meet is held at the College Park ground. Washington and Baltimore are now cooperating energetically for the selection of this territory as the scene of the aerial free-for-all of 1910, and it is expected that one of the strongest claims for its selection will be found in the fact that Uncle Sam has ready to hand at College Park an acceptable aviation field manned by soldiers who are thoroughly familiar not only with local conditions but also with the technical side of aeronautics.

NEW GOLD BRICK GAMES.

Americans are the cream of the credulous, declares a writer in Pearson's Magazine. We sometimes harbor the idea that the Britisher is the most ready and willing of all men to part with his money to a sure thing gamester, but when it comes to competition against all comers the average American hits the bullseye.

The sure thing men of to-day (incorporated) know this and build upon it. One of the biggest of them claimed not long ago that if he were given time he could sell worthless stock to three Americans out of every five, provided the gullible three had the money or could raise it.

He actually counts upon one victim for every 50 circulars sent out through the mails. The common average, as the postal officials tell you, is one dupe for every hundred circulars. Not bad, considering the cheapness of printing and postage.

There is a firm in New York that collects and sells addresses of people who buy things through the mails or who have at some time evinced a desire to do so. These addresses are sold at $8 a thousand. They are assorted under various headings. If, for example, 12,000 men have sent in applications for wives to a New York matrimonial bureau that list is worth $6 to a $3 diamond ring concern that is setting up a circular mill.

The sure thing operator has passed through various stages of progress. The now unsafe shell game, gold brick and green goods swindles which he operated with such profitable results in the eighties and the early nineties made way for the half-interest game, which flourished 10 years ago, and the employment game, which is still going on, though not to its former extent.

The half-interest advertiser sold you a partnership in anything from a peanut stand to a piano factory. When you had bought it the next thing was to find it, or if you found it you discovered that it belonged to somebody else who knew nothing about the men who sold it to you.

The employment game consists of an opportunity to sell on high salary the goods or the stock of a company in which you must first buy shares. Then when you have paid over your money you are assigned a territory, generally a long distance from the company's office. After you have gone at your own expense to Milwaukee, Dubuque or Kansas City, there to await telegraphic orders as to what to do next, you take it out in waiting. The orders never come, and when you get back to the company's office you find that the company has floated away on the magic carpet, nobody knows where.

But it was soon found by the swindlers that these devices, like the green goods game, were rather crude and almost equally unsafe. So to the education of the man who ran the half interest or employment scheme was added a post-graduate course in high finance.

It came to be recognized by the swindling gentry that there was nothing like a corporation when one wanted to do a really safe and prosperous business. Then, too, the corporation must have something somewhere.

If it is a mining company it must have a hole in the ground. If it is a rubber or coffee company it must have some sort of concession from the Mexican or a South American government, which it is always very easy to get. If it is a cotton concern it must have a fence corner somewhere down south.

These things are actually necessary in order to show in court when the time comes that the men who have taken your money have endeavored to carry out their part of the contract and that they have failed is merely their misfortune. For to fail in business is not necessarily a crime.

WHAT, INDEED?

"James was always kind of morose," said Mrs. Page to her caller, "but now he's married again, seems as if he couldn't bear to have anybody smile. 'There you go, he says to Almiry, the other day, 'always singing them secular songs in this vale of woe. What if you was took sudden,' says he, 'and called to your last account with the "Soldier's Tear" in your mouth?' "—Exchange.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

He Doesn't Like to Be Written Up

BRADLEY
THE PRESS

TWELVE years ago, when Senator-elect William O'Connell Bradley of Kentucky, was governor of that state, a youth who at 15 was carrying the editorial burden of a weekly newspaper in a country town in Illinois drifted into Frankfort on a bicycle trip. There wasn't much to see in Frankfort except the state capitol, so he went up there.

It was the young editor's first inspection of a state capitol, and his eyes were open for everything. Naturally the sign "Governor's Office" interested him, and he quickly decided to call on the governor. He sent in his card and presently the doorkeper returned and said: "The governor will see you."

Then did the visitor really wish that his curiosity about the governor's office hadn't got the better of him. It would be manifestly improper to intrude on the governor's time without some motive, and still the young editor couldn't think of any motive. On the way to the inner office he decided to take the governor into his confidence and confess that there wasn't any cause for the visit, except a small matter of editorial courtesy.

Prompted, no doubt, by that spirit that has made him the head of his party in the state and that enabled him to win his fight for the senate against apparently overwhelming odds, Gov. Bradley talked to the boy journalist for an hour, speaking most interestingly on subjects that could not fail to interest even a youth that didn't have a news instinct.

The governor described his early experiences as a Republican in a Democratic hotbed, when to go to the polls and vote the Republican ticket was only one form of committing suicide. He told how at one period of his political activity it became necessary for all the Republicans of the town in which he lived to fortify themselves in a house and defend themselves against Democratic raiders who were thirsting for blood.

There were so many of these stories that the hour had passed before either the governor or his visitor knew it, and when the boy editor finally excused himself he carried away a picture bearing the governor's autograph.

When Gov. Bradley won his successful fight before the Kentucky legislature a few weeks ago the editor, who had been reduced by lapse of time to just plain reporter, remembered these stories of the early days, and wrote the senator-elect asking the privilege of telling them to the whole country. Gov. Bradley's reply stamps him as a man who is going to make himself disliked in Washington if he doesn't change his mind:

"There is nothing that is more distasteful to me than to talk about myself, and you must excuse me from entering into an account of my past experience as a politician. I have never written it up, and never expect to."

Hobo in the President's Private Car

TAFT SPECIAL

A TRAMP got into President Taft's private car recently, and a very surprised tramp he must have been, for he was pounced upon by two of the most muscular Pullman porters he had ever seen and then arrested by Secret Service Officer Sloan.

It was on the Federal express, running from Boston to Washington, on the rear end of which the president's private car Mayflower was coupled at New Haven.

The tramp got on somewhere along the line. There were two day coaches ahead of the presidential car, and they were so crowded that they couldn't have looked healthy to the most optimistic of tramps. But there was a Pullman, and it looked nice and dark. and so the wanderer strolled in and hid himself.

It was Letcher, one of the porters, who found the visitor crouched in a dark corner of the tiny kitchen. He made a dive for the man and got him in a clinch. Then he called his fellow porter, Anderson. The two of them had the tramp so scared that he could hardly see by the time the secret service men came in and put him under arrest.

At Bridgeport the tramp was turned over to the police. He tried to say that he was a brakeman on the New York, New Haven & Hartford road, but the trainmen knew better. Mr. Taft slept right through it, and never knew a thing about it until the next morning.

This Kind of Servant at a Premium

WASHINGTON housekeepers are inclined to think that T. B. Witherspoon of St. Louis was romancing recently when he told of a negro servant who has been in his employ for 15 years. It appears that the negro was given ten days' leave and money to spend for a trip down to New Orleans, but in three days turned up again, and here is the way Mr. Witherspoon explains the negro's return, quoting the servant:

"'You see, suh, it done get mighty miserably cold night after I lef' you, and I knows dat Miss Kate (my wife) ain't got no business tryin' to work dat furnace, and I know you ain't gwine to bother with it. Nary one of you got enny business with a dirty old furnace, least of all Miss Kate, who ain't got no right to soil her little han's. I couldn't sleep good thinkin' about it, an' dat's why I gits back quicker'n I 'spected.'

"There is a specimen act of an old-time, true-hearted darky, whose first thought is of the comfort of his employer." If Witherspoon could find about a thousand like that servant, the St. Louis man could make a good commission by shipping them to Washington.

Pages in the Senate Mimic Big Men

IT IS the custom for the senate pages to hold two or three mock senate sessions every winter. These sessions are held on afternoons when the senate is not sitting, and are conducted with all the solemnity and poise of a regular meeting.

One day the youngsters were conducting a mock trial of the Swayne impeachment case. "Billy" Annin was presiding. Another youngster was posing as Anthony Higgins, counsel for Judge Swayne, and was interrogating a witness. Senator Spooner of Wisconsin, came into the senate chamber unexpectedly, and, seeing what was going on, took a seat near the entrance to the cloakroom.

Presently an intricate parliamentary question arose, and half a dozen pages were on their feet asking for recognition. Mr. Spooner thought he might be able to clarify the question. Accordingly he approached his seat and called out: "Mr. President!"

The irrepressible "Billy" was not taken back. "The chair will recognize the senator from Wisconsin," he said, as he brought down the gavel and nodded to Mr. Spooner.

The ease and poise of the youngster startled Senator Spooner, and it was nearly a minute before he could control his twinkling eyes.

"Is it not out of order," he asked, "to permit so many senators to address the chair at the same time?"

"It is decidedly out of order," said the piping voice in the vice-president's chair.

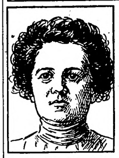
"The point made by the senator from Wisconsin is well taken. The senate will come to order."

In the house of representatives there are 23 pages, and in the senate 16.

According to the regulations, no page can be under 12 years or over 16 years of age.

PROMINENT PEOPLE

DELVES INTO OTHER WORLD

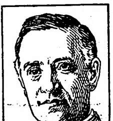


Believers in the occult are all agog over the visit to the United States of Madame Eusapia Paladino—she pronounces it Ay-u-sah-pe-a Paladeeno—a famous Italian spiritualistic medium, who came from her native country to be examined by the American Society for Scientific Research. She is the medium through whom Prof. Caesar Lombroso, the criminologist, promised to converse after his death. Lombroso died recently and his death has revived interest in the madame.

In the presence of newspaper reporters and theatrical people, at a private seance, she performed feats which surprised the beholders. Though men held her feet and knees and declare that they did not move, while her hands were always visible, she caused a table to rise four feet off the stage and remain suspended half a minute. When it fell to the floor it landed on the foot of an observer, who complained in English. The medium cannot understand one word of English, but understood the complaint and answered it in Italian. Articles of furniture were moved about, a bell, a plate, a flute and a tambourine were picked up by an immense hand, curtains were blown about and people were toched by some invisible object. All the time an electric light was burning in the room.

"English John," the spirit entity that accompanies Mme. Paladino and moves heavy objects for her, works, according to Sir Oliver Lodge, like an invisible animal of a good deal more strength than hers which does her bidding—at times. Sir Oliver Lodge was a member of the English Society for Psychical Research and early in the nineties that organization was about to put its approval upon the Neapolitan medium as a person with supernormal powers, when she was discovered doing some crude trick work at Cambridge. The society then repudiated her.

FALCONIO TO GET RED HAT



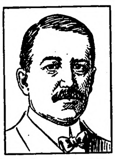
It is pretty generally believed among Catholics that Mgr. Falconio, papal delegate to the United States, is to be made a cardinal. Persons in a position to know, who have just returned from Rome, say it is the intention of the pope to confer the red hat on Mgr. Falconio.

Mgr. Falconio is a native of Abruzzi, which lies in the mountainous country east of Rome, on the Adriatic. He has himself said that at 15 he desired to become a priest, but this desire was rather discouraged by his father, who, although a man of pious convictions, had cherished other plans for his son. His mother, however, encouraged the idea, and at the age of 18 Diomede Falconio entered the Franciscan order, sailing four years later for America.

The boy was then too young to assume the name of priest and he became a teacher of the classics at St. Bonaventure college, of which he was later made president. He set diligently to work mastering English from his associates in the faculty and from members of the student body itself. After a period of six months' further study in the college he was made a priest and was known as Father Diomede. He remained in college work for three or four years, when he was assigned with Father Anacletus to missionary work at Winsted, Conn. He remained there for two years, and then, in obedience to the command of the minister general he went to Newfoundland in the same capacity.

He was rewarded by the pope in August, 1899, with the important post of apostolic delegate to the Dominion of Canada. His unusual familiarity with matters of ecclesiastical administration singled him out for the still more important post at Washington when a vacancy was created by the appointment of Martinelli as cardinal.

YOUNG GOTHAM FINANCIER



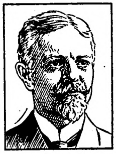
Gates W. McGarrah, president of the Mechanics' National bank, went to New York City not so very long ago from up-state, seeking his fortune, and soon added his name to the long list of country boys who have made good in metropolitan affairs. He was born about 45 years ago at Monroe, Orange county, N. Y. He got his first taste of banking as a clerk in the bank at Goshen, near his birthplace.

After some years of experience as a country banker, he decided to try New York, and arrived in the metropolis some 15 years ago. His first position was at the Produce Exchange bank. Then he went over to the Leather Manufacturers' bank, where he worked his way right up the line, becoming cashier and eventually president.

Then the Merchants' National bank desired to have Mr. McGarrah as its president. The only way to do it was to combine with the Mechanics' National. The merger was soon brought about. It was especially easy owing to the fact that the two banks were next door to each other. A hole was knocked through the wall separating them and the merger was made.

Mr. McGarrah is a member of the clearing house committee and was for two years secretary of the clearing house, being one of the youngest men to hold that position.

PEACE LEADER IN A WAR



Congressman Richard Bartholdt, of the tenth district of Missouri, may be president of the Interparliamentary Peace tribunal of 2,000 members, but that is no guarantee that he will have peace. At the present moment the congressman is the center of a war, a war that is directed against him because he has too many affiliations with St. Louis beer and breweries, opponents say. The congressman was scheduled to speak November 11 from a St. Louis Presbyterian church pulpit on the subject of international peace.

This stirred the members of the young men's church clubs of the city to say, "Huh, here is an advocate of peace, a man who drinks beer, which causes fights."

Then the young men's club members got out their pens and wrote a letter calling the congressman the "kaiser of the St. Louis Germans." The letter asserted that the address was untimely, because Congressman Bartholdt is not working for peace when he does not help to stop liquor law infractions.

As a peace advocate, Congressman Bartholdt has once been recommended for the Nobel prize of $40,000, which ex-President Roosevelt captured by ending the Russo-Jap war, and he has been made the custodian of a trust peace fund of $41,000,000 by Andrew Carnegie.

His idea of the way in which national peace can be assured is the guaranteeing of territorial and political integrity and home rule by a congress of nations, equal opportunities for trade in all lands, and a congress for the passing of international laws, and no armies.

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Rats Under Ban in New York Schools

CRUSADE AGAINST RATS

NEW YORK.—The interest in various important features of the day's news recently was completely overshadowed in certain sections of the city by a rumor that a great public uprising against the wearing of "rats" in women's hair has been started, and that the hirsute rodents were doomed to extinction.

"Down with the rat!" it was asserted was to be the battle cry.

The rumor caused consternation, not only in several co-educational institutions, where the matter came up for swift and decisive adjustment, but in department stores and other places, where mere man had put his foot down hard on the familiar feminine head adornment, and there were unmistakable rumblings of a revolution to be heard wherever the question was discussed.

The trouble started at the Erasmus Hall high school, where the assistant principal, Miss Kate E. Turner, laid down the law forbidding "rats" or "switches," and the following day enforcing the law against violators by forcably removing the offending adornments.

While these momentous events were transpiring in the borough across the bridge, indignation was at an even higher boiling point in the department store district in Manhattan. In several of the big stores notices were posted in prominent places that "rats" in the hair of employes would not be tolerated, the penalty for ignoring the order to be dismissal.

During the luncheon hour nothing but the new order and plans for combating it were discussed. In one store it was decided that a committee should wait upon the manager and ask him to rescind the order or face a general strike.

"This is the most outrageous proceeding I ever heard of," said one young woman, "and I think we would be fools to submit to it.

"Why, they wouldn't dare to do such things in Siberia or China or wherever it is they have a czar. I for one am going to wear just as big a 'rat' as I like, and I don't care if the floorwalker does report me."

May Go to Penitentiary in Barrel

ST. LOUIS.—The law of the State is responsible for Albert Kapp, son of a poor widow being a jail prisoner. The rule of the penitentiary is responsible for his being almost without clothing in the bastile.

Prisoners who reach the penitentiary under sentence, are divested of their clothes and the garments are burned. "Stir" clothes are provided and in these the unfortunates must live till their sentence expires and then in garb furnished by the big prison they fare forth into the world, a prey for the keen eyes of the sleuths.

Every man who is sentenced learns this from the old-timers and there is a rule in the city jail that men going up sell all their belongings before they start because the inscription of Dante is paraphrased into, "All property abandon ye who enter here" over the gates of the prison.

Kapp is a youth. He had some trouble with a man, and the man said it was an attempted robbery. The police, because Albert had been in trouble before, insisted on a two-years' sentence. So, following the custom of the jail, he sold to other inmates of the cells his possessions save a torn and frayed pair of trousers, a tattered shirt and a worn pair of shoes. His mother brought him some dainties and left him. She could not bear to come back and see the lad, mancled and leg ironed to the long chain. Neither did the boy wish her to come to see him go. He dreaded the scene. Their apprehension was not necessary.

Then the State decided there were extenuating circumstances in the case and in order to look the facts over again, and with a view perhaps to paroling the boy, the sheriff was asked not to take Albert with the thirty-eight other convicted persons to the penitentiary.

"But what am I going to do?" he asked Jailer Wolf, surveying his garments.

They were just sufficient to prevent him appearing a la Adam. The jailer laughed good naturedly and told the story of how Albert had divested himself in order that the State should not get any the better of him and how he would have to attend services Sunday in a blanket.

Hotel for Chinese Planned in Chicago

CHICAGO.—If Ah Sing, hero of Bret Harte's world-famous poem, were to pay a visit to Chicago within the next month or so, he would find himself able to enter a Chinese hotel, hand his grip to a Chinese bellboy, affix his signature to a Chinese register, eat a Chinese meal and sleep in a Chinese bed.

Also, he would be able to read a Chinese newspaper, to be awakened in the morning by a Chinese servant, to call for a cup of real Chinese tea and eat a dish of breakfast food hailing not from Battle Creek but Canton. And he could hear a Chinese orchestra playing Chinese popular songs.

For Chicago is to have a Chinese hotel, the first in the city operated on the "Oriental Plan." It is to be as complete and as modern as the best American hostelry. Everything in it is going to be Chinese, from the guests to the chop-sticks in the dining-room. Everything will be designed to make Ah Sing or any other oriental guest feel perfectly at home.

The new hotel will be located in the heart of the Chinese industrial center, at 112 Federal street. The lease for the building has been applied for by the Chinamen behind the move t establish their own hotel.

Cat Aids Auctioneer in Realty Sale

CHICAGO.—A big office cat, the pet of the real estate board, was, "assistant auctioneer" at a recent sale in the exchange rooms, and to tabby is given the credit for many raises in prices.

George L. Warner of the firm of Baird & Warner was the "emergency auctioneer," but before he had become initiated in his new task the cat appeared on the scene and perched herself upon the desk in front of the "realty salesman."

Mr. Warner started in as if he had been in the auction business all his life. The bids came in fast and in large sums. All the time the cat peered down at the men struggling to get a chance at a certain desirable piece of property.

Suddenly there was a lull in the proceedings. Bids were slow and the "raises" came dribbling along in small amounts. Auctioneer Warner couldn't understand it. He began to think that his success as a forceful auctioneer was to be short lived.

True, it was his first experience, but he had started out with such a rush of business that he was congratulating himself. He looked at the desk where tabby had been.

She had deserted her post. That seemed to explain the situation. A hurry call was sent for the cat. Scarcely had she resumed her place on the auction desk than the bidding livened up. Prices went soaring and the former enthusiasm was revived.

"And the cat came back," some one remarked.

After the sale was over it was agreed by all, including Mr. Warner, that tabby was responsible for making the day's sale successful.

STILL THE LAND OF PROMISE.

That America is still looked upon as a land of promise by the people of foreign countries is well illustrated by the desertion of some 200 men from the British warships which visited New York for the Hudson-Fulton celebration. The Uinted States is still the lure of Europe, says Cleveland Plain Dealer. The Eldorado is yet west of the Atlantic. The experience of the English fleet is but a repetition of what has been met many times before by fleets visiting the American coast. There is always the temptation for the visiting tar to come ashore and forget to return. Perhaps they have relatives in this country ready to shield them and give them a home and a start in the new world. Perhaps they have merely absorbed the current European opinion that the way to fortune and comfort lies through the gates of New York. A striking contrast is offered between the experience of the American fleet on its recent world tour and the usual experience of the fleets visiting this country. It was one of the boasts of the returning American ships that the men aboard and ashore had conducted themselves with almost prefect decorum; that none had deserted, though opportunities to do so had been many. This is not to argue that American tars are any better grade of men than those of other navies—though we are pleased to believe they are—but merely indicates their different point of view.

The custom of turning up the trousers in damp weather presumably originated in the metropolis of Great Britain. Its practice there has been universal for several generations, and has been imitated by Americans affecting English styles. Years ago, when the fashion of trousers too long for the legs of the wearers, with the deliberate intention that they should be perpetually turned up, was first introduced, the humorous paragraphers said that Anglomaniacs who adopted it were going about with their trousers turned up because it was raining in London. From London, however, comes now a warning voice to the effect that turning up the trousers is a practice prejudicial to health. London is suffering from an epidemic of influenza, and a physician connected with one of the great hospitals suggests as among the causes of the outbreak the habit of turning up the trousers.

American exporters, it appears from a report of Special Agent Butman, are not sufficiently courteous in their business correspondence with Spanish-American dealers, and the fact is represented as operating to our disadvantage. Politeness goes far with the Latin-American buyer, he points out, and an instance is cited of loss of trade due to a curt acknowledgment by a New York house of a check from a Panama importer. Except with the mercantile firms of the old school with which traditions are strong, the omission has become general from commercial correspondence of the formulas of courtesy which once characterized it. The little niceties of phraseology with which letters were begun or ended are dispensed with under the new order of office economies, in which time-saving has become the main thing.

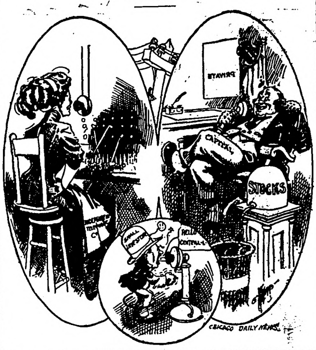
The disruption of the international potash syndicate, which is reported from Germany, calls attention to an industry that has grown to enormous proportions in recent years. Potash is used for reviving impoverished soils. There are immense beds of it in Germany and in the United States. During the present year Germany has taken steps to prevent the exportation of potash from Germany. It is expected that very low prices will result from the disagreement between the owners of large German mines.

The popular conception of warm countries, like Mexico, is that they are lands of plenty, because of the succession of crops that can be readily raised. But Mexico reports an experience suggesting a different state of things. An appeal comes from Guanajuato, where the crops were destroyed by an unusual visitation of cold weather and frost. The government has ordered from the United States by telegraph 200,000 bushels of corn, and undoubtedly more will have to be provided.

One of the trustees of a prominent college refused to vote for the admission of women to the law school, saying he was opposed to all change; he was even opposed to railroads and telephones. Such opposition as this will do any cause more good than harm.

A new explosive which can be hammered, burned or rammed down a gun without exploding is on the market. Just the thing for little Johnny's safe and sane Fourth next year!

BUSY.



NAVY TO BE REORGANIZED

BEST SYSTEM IN THE WORLD IS PLANNED.

Swift Board Appointed Months Ago Is About to Submit Its Report.

Washington.—The United States navy is to be reorganized from the newest leviathan of the "Dreadnought" type to the armored cruisers and auxiliaries.

Misfits, such as the Connecticut, the armor belt of which is said to be almost entirely below the water line, will henceforth be impossible.

The fleets of the world power of the western hemisphere are to become actually the nation's asset of pride on the seas instead of on the blue prints of bureaucratic experts, many of whom have never had the sting of salt winds in their nostrils.

In short, politics is to be removed from the management of naval bureaus and shipyards and fighting ships are to be built under the supervision of the men who fight them instead of along the plans of civilians and politicians.

The Swift board, named months ago to go to the bottom of the naval situation in the United States and bring out every fault, is about to make its report. The navy department has not yet learned that it is due for reconstruction.

Not since the Spanish war revealed the weakness of the American military establishment and the subsequent drastic reorganization which Elihu Root, then secretary of war, succeeded in bringing about, has there appeared a more general upheaval of the organization of the fighting forces of a world power than is foreshadowed in the Swift board report. The board has reached its verdict that the navy department must be reconstructed, after studying the systems of control in the admiralties of all the great nations.

The advisory board idea, for instance, is borrowed from the British admiralty and the plan to put young men in control and have the fighters decide what kind of ships to build is taken from the German system. Included in the report is a demand for a thorough reorganization of the navy yard administration.

CONSTABLE SAVED FROM MOB

Quarrel Over Children Playing Together Leads to Killing at Quincy—Lynching Party Foiled.

Quincy, Ill.—Constable James H. Dobbs narrowly escaped lynching at Columbus after he had shot and killed William Thompson, his neighbor.

The killing was the result of a quarrel over the children of the men.

Dobbs knocked Thompson down and then shot him to death. When word was brought here that a mob was forming to lynch Dobbs a number of officers hurried to Columbus in an automobile and brought Dobbs to this city, where he was lodged in jail.

Des Moines Lad Hangs Self.

Des Moines, Ia.—Harold Perkins, aged 16, who hanged himself to his bedroom door because he had been refused permission to attend the Drake-Ames football game, it is believed, expected his aunt to discover him and cut him down before he died.

Two German Aviators Killed.

Berin.—Dr. Brenckmann and Hugo Francke, the two most daring members of the Aero club of Berlin, lost their lives through the collapse of their balloon Kolmar. Their bodies were found near Fiume, Austria-Hungary.

May Surround Riff Tribesmen.

Melilla, Morocco.—Gen. Marina Friday left at the head of a considerable force of Spanish troops with the intention of surrounding Mount Veni—Buffur and isolating the Riff tribesmen, who are still intrenched there.

Eggs Are Brought from Shanghai.

Victoria, B. C.—The steamer Empress of China, from the orient, brought 116 barrels of eggs from Shanghai. This is the first shipment of the kind to America.

STEAMERS FIGHT BIG SEAS

One Reaches Port After Hard Struggle, Other at Anchor in Disabled Condition.

St. Joseph, Mich.—Two of the finest passenger steamers of the Graham & Morton Transportation line, operating between Chicago, Holland and St. Joseph, suffered a narrow escape from foundering off this port.

The City of Benton Harbor lies at her docks here, having reached port after thrilling fight of five hours with a 60-mile gale of wind and snow, while the steamer Puritan, a staunch boat of steel, rudderless and to more or less extent at the mercy of the seas, lies off New Buffalo, some 18 miles south of here. Tugs from South Chicago are fighting their way across the lake to succor the disabled craft. Officials of the Graham & Morton Company here say the Puritan is in no danger, though her wireless is wrecked and communication with her is impossible.

A few hours out of Chicago the Puritan lost her rudder, and from then on until her anchors were dropped as a last resort she drifted helplessly at the mercy of wave and wind. Blown far from her course she was steadily making shoreward when anchors were dropped, which followed a thrilling attempt on the part of the Benton Harbor to put a line aboard the helpless boat. In the heavy gale, however, this was impossible. Before a line could be securely fastened it parted and an instant later the Benton Harbor's stern struck the Puritan's bow.

PRESIDENT EATS REAL FOOD

Taft Expresses Pleasure at Being Able to Partake of Dinner Without Making an Address.

Washington.—Satiated with possum dinners and elaborate banquets, he was forced to face in his recent trip from coast to coasa, President Taft sat down Thursday to a family Thansgiving dinner. The piece de resistance was a mastodonic turkey, that had been raised on a Rhode Island farm, and looked almost mountainous in its proportions.

"Thank goodness," the president sighed happily, as dessert was served, "I've had a dinner at which I haven't been compelled to make speeches, and where no reception committees lurked in the background. I've enjoyed food—real food—and I haven't had to work to get it."

The president did not have any guests at dinner. Only the members of the Taft family were present, including Mrs. Laughlin, sister of Mrs. Taft.

LYMAN J. GAGE IS MARRIED

Former Secretary of Treasury Weds Woman Whom He Induced to Join Theosophy Cult.

San Diego, Cal.—Former Secretary of the Treasury Lyman Judson Gage and Mrs. Frances Ada Ballou were married at the Coronado home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Ballou.

The marriage license gives the bride's age as 25 and the groom's as 73. The wedding was private, only the parents of the bride and the attendants, Miss Helene Richards and Mr. Gage's brother-in-law, Col. Wesley Brainerd, witnessing the ceremony, which was performed by Rev. Willard B. Thorpe, pastor of the First Congregational church of San Diego.

After a wedding supper Mr. and Mrs. Gage started for Denver, Col. The courtship began with Mr. Gage's attempts to convert Mrs. Ballou to the theosophic faith.

Banker Accidentally Kills Self.

Webster City, Ia.—F. A. Edwards, president of the Webster City Savings bank, accidentally shot himself in the abdomen Tuesday and was compelled to throw a shoe through the big plate glass front window to attract aid. He died later at Mercy hospital. He was dusting the counter when his duster struck the cashier's revolver, exploding it. Mr. Edwards had been three times mayor of this city, postmaster under Cleveland, and was one of the best-known shorthorn cattle breeders in the west.

OPPOSITION FLOWN

FRIENDS OF SHIP SUBSIDY BILL NO LONGER FEAR FOES.

MEASURE WILL BE ADOPTED

Opponents Will No Longer Be Able to Influence Congressmen Against the Extension of Bounties to All American Ships.

Washington.—Congress will pass the ship subsidy bill at the coming session of congress and that, too, without much opposition.

The measure, say its friends, has passed the house in one form or another several times during the past few decades, but has been blocked in the senate as many times. This time there will be little opposition in the upper house, and the lower branch taking advantage of the situation probably will increase the sums to be granted to all American ships engaged in commerce between home and foreign ports.

The measure as it now stands, and as it will be presented to the house, provides subsidies only to South American and Asiatic ports, and these are so meager that their effect in building up an American merchant marine representative of the richest nation in the world would not be very great. These bounties, it is understood, will be increased to some extent and there will be a provision for extending the bounties to vessels plying to European ports.

Friends of the measure assert that this provision has heretofore been left out to avoid opposition from the powerful syndicate operating Atlantic liners. They now hold that the opposition of these interests will no longer be able to influence congressmen in the face of a sentiment that has become sweeping.

ARREST CUSTOM WEIGHER

Is Charged with Conspiracy—Collector Loeb Discharges Ten More Employes.

New York.—Federal prosecutors added another important chapter to the extensive investigation of alleged frauds in the customs service.

While new evidence was being presented to the federal grand jury with the purpose of obtaining more indictments Friday, Thomas C. Giddings, as assistant customs weigher, was arrested on a charge of conspiracy in connection with the importation of figs. Shortly before this Collector Loeb announced that he had removed ten more assistant weighers making a total of 83 men who had been dropped from the customs here since March 9. Mr. Loeb said these removals would complete the "house cleaning" which he has been carrying on since he assumed office.

IS VICTIM OF BLACK HAND

Unknown Men Shatter Italian's Store with Dynamite—Five Buildings Wrecked.

Danville, Ill.—A charge of dynamite weighing perhaps 25 pounds was exploded under the fruit and wine house of Joseph Mascari, 11 College street, Tuesday, utterly demolishing five buildings and causing $50,000 damage.

Buildings both to the north and to the south of the Mascari place were completely wrecked, and plate glass windows in every building for three squares were demolished. Mascari charged members of the "Black Hand" society with the crime, but he declined to say whether he had received threatening letters from any source.

ASTOR SAFE, SAYS SKIPPER

Captain Confirms Report That Yacht Nourmahal Was in San Juan Harbor November 17.

New York.—Col. John Jacob Astor and son, Vincent, with their guests and crew, are safe on board the yacht Nourmahal somewhere in West Indian waters. The yacht arrived at San Juan on November 14, and was still there on the evening of November 17, when all peril from the terrific hurricane had gone. Since then the Nourmahal has probably sailed for Ponce. This information was brought by the Insular line steamship Harry Luckenbach which reached New York Tuesday from San Juan, P. R.

228 JAP MINERS ENTOMBED

Fifteen Are Reported Killed in Explosion in a Coal Mine—Fate of Others Doubtful.

Tokyo.—Heavy loss of life is feared as the result of an explosion in a coal mine at Onoura, Fukuoka province.

Fifteen men are known to have perished, while 228 miners are entombed in the workings. Every attempt is being made to rescue them, but their fate is as yet in doubt.

Gridiron Deaths Are Twenty-Nine.

New York.—With the close of the football season, statistics show that 29 players lost their lives through the game in different parts of the country this fall, according to a list made public here Friday.

Talk of Successor to Bryce.

London.—A Madrid dispatch to the Morning Telegraph says it is reported there that Sir Maurice de Bunsen, British ambassador at Madrid, soon will replace Ambassador Bryce at Washington.

ANOTHER WARSHIP IS SENT

TAFT ORDERS PRINCETON TO SAIL FOR CORINTO.

Zelaya to Be Brought to Terms Without Delay—Will Recognize the Rebels.

Washington.—The gunboat Princeton was ordered by the navy department to sail for Corinto, Nicaragua, to join the gunboat Vicksburg, already at that port. The Princeton is now at the Bremerton navy yard, Washington, undergoing repairs.

The United States government is anxious to know whether the time is ripe for the recognition of the provisional or revolutionary government in Nicaragua. Unofficial advices say that the advance of the insurgent forces has been so rapid that the crisis cannot be far off.

Prompt action by the United States in formally recognizing the Estrada government would mean the success of the battle to oust Zelaya. Delay might prove serious if the strength of Zelaya's army has been under-estimated.

Report of Deaths Coming.

A lull in the proceedings against President Zelaya was caused by the reception of an official notification from the Nicaraguan charge d'affaires that the full record of the trial of the two Americans shot by order of the court-martial would arrive on the next steamer.

Before the message was received Secretary Knox had had an interview with John Barrett, director of the bureau of American republics, and it is understood that in view of the remarkable successes of the revolutionary forces it was decided to wait until Monday to see if Estrada would be successful in occupying Managua, in which case the recognition of the revolutionists would follow as a matter of course, and all need for American intervention would cease.

United States Has Gone Limit.

It is recognized by the representatives of foreign governments here that the United States has gone to a limit in this matter which it could not do safely in dealing with a more powerful adversary without a declaration of war following. No diplomatic criticism of the course of the state department has been discovered.

Momentarily expecting the overthrow of the Zelaya dynasty, the state department has flashed a long and confidential telegram to United States Minister Merry at Costa Rica, and other telegrams to the naval station at Colon and to the commander of the Des Moines in Greytown harbor.

What important information they contained is being guarded with great secrecy by the state officials.

POSSE KILLS TWO WOMEN

Mother and Daughter Shot to Death While Helping Father and Son to Escape.

Williamson, W. Va.—Firing from the doorway of their home on a sheriff's posse to give the father and brother of the girl time to escape, Mrs. Charles Daniels and her 16-year-old daughter were shot to death near Devon, Mingo county, by the officers. The shooting of Mrs. Daniels and her daughter grew out of a family feud between the Christians and the Danielses on the border of Kentucky and West Virginia. The Christians lived in Mingo county, West Virginia, and the Daniels in Pike county, Kentucky.

About three weeks ago George Christian ventured to the Kentucky side and was slain by Jim Daniels. Christian and Daniels were brothers-in-law and had formerly been allies.

MOXLEY GOES TO CONGRESS

Regular Republican Candidate in Sixth Illinois District Is Elected to Succeed Senator Lorimer.

Chicago.—William J. Moxley, the regular Republican candidate for congressman for the Sixth Illinois congressional district, was elected Tuesday to succeed William Lorimer, who resigned when elected to the United States senate, by a plurality of 6,277 votes.

The vote resulted as follows:

W. J. Moxley (Rep.), 14,494; Carl L. Barnes (Ind.), 8,317; Frank S. Ryan (Dem.), 6,277.

The campaign in this election was most bitterly contested and was participated in by many Republicans of national and state fame, including Speaker Cannon and Gov. Deneen.

Message Still Unwritten.

Washington.—Although he has only a week's leeway, President Taft has not written his message to congress nor any part of it and the cabinet was in session Friday for more than two hours dicsussing various features which the president proposes to submit.

Funeral of De Armond.

Butler, Mo.—The funeral of Congressman D. A. De Armond and grandson who were burned to death took place here Friday. A successor to the congressman will be named in a few days.

Dies on Way to a Feast.

New York.—While on his way to the Salvation Army headquarters to get a Thanksgiving dinner John Devery, homeless and friendless, collapsed and a few hours later died from starvation.

Gold Yield in 1908 $94,560,000.

Washington.—The gold mines in the United States produced $94,560,000 worth of the precious metal in 1908, according to the reports by the United States geological survey.

LOST REGISTERED LETTERS FOUND IN QUEER PLACE

Missed From a Mangled Mail Bag, They are Recovered From Car Trucks.

It does not always follow that the disappearance of registered mail packages indicate a robbery of the mail. This was demonstrated on The Overland Limited train No. 2 Friday, November 5th, when a package of five registered letters from Schuyler disappeared between that point and Omaha.

The recovery of the lost package was as strange as its disappearance. The Schuyler pouch is picked up from a crane by means of a pouch catcher as the train passes. This pouch catcher is attached to the mail car and hooks onto the pouch suspended from the crane as the train passes. In this particular instance the pouch catcher did not make a good catch and the pouch fell under the wheels of the train and was cut in two. The mail was scattered along the track for a considerable distance, but the five registered letters, which were in a packet, could not be found when the other mail was picked up. The impression at once prevailed that the registered package had been found and kept by some one and it was reported as lost.

Postoffice Inspector L. A. Thompson was started out to investigate. His first visit was to Council Bluffs to make inquiries of the postal clerks on the car, and scarcely had he reached there when he received word that the registered package had been found by the car cleaner resting snugly on the trucks under the dining car, where it had been blown or thrown when the mail pouch was flung under the wheels at Schuyler.

That the package was not injured in the slightest, nor jarred from its position on the trucks, is simply another tribute to the Union Pacific's unsurpassed roadbed and perfect track.

Country Neglecting the Children.

If the percentage of tuberculous children recently ascertained by an investigation in Stockholm, Sweden (1.61 per cent.) were applied to the schools of the United States there would be 273,700 children between the ages of eight and fifteen who are positively affected with tuberculosis, according to a statement of the National Association for the study and prevention of tuberculosis. As contrasted with this figure, there are only 11 open-air tuberculosis schools in operation in the entire country, and nine more under consideration. At the lowest estimate, even with all the schools now in operation and those proposed, accommodations will not be provided for four-tenths of one per cent. of the children who need this special treatment.

Boy's Essay on Clothing.

Here is an extract from an essay, written by a boy in a London school: "Clothing is an article which everybody should wear. The least of this article is worn by savages or natives, which is a piece of cloth or a few leaves or feathers round the waist. In cold countries, same as Eskimos, the people wear more clothes than we do, count of the icy cold out there. They can skate all the year round, except about one thaw there is in summer. If they walked about like natives they would catch cold directly and die of bronkitis. We put clothes on which are nearly like our bodies, some have caps, coats and trousers, but women and girls wear hats and frocks to tell who they are."

The Fez a Necessity.

All through the markets of every Turkish city and village are little shops where the fez can be pressed and ironed for a few cents. At his prayers a Moslem could not use a hat with a brim, as his head must press the prayer rug a certain number of times during each prayer. As the head must be covered at all times, a fez or some other brimless covering must be used.

SECRET WORKERS

The Plan Upon Which Coffee Operates.

Coffee is such a secret worker that it is not suspected as the cause of sickness or disease, but there is a very sure way to find out the truth.

A lady in Memphis gives an interesting experience her husband had with coffee. It seems that he had been using it for some time and was an invalid.

The physician in charge shrewdly suspected that coffee was the "Worm at the root of the tree," and ordered it discontinued with instructions to use Postum regularly in its place.

The wife says: "We found that was the true remedy for his stomach and heart trouble and we would have gladly paid a hundred times the amount of the doctor's charge when we found how wise his judgment was.

"The use of Postum instead of coffee was begun about a year ago, and it has made my husband a strong, well man. He has gained thirty-five pounds in that time and his stomach and heart troubles have all disappeared.

"The first time I prepared it I did not boil it long enough and he said there was something wrong with it. Sure enough it did taste very flat, but the next morning I followed directions carefully, boiling it for fifteen minutes, and he remarked 'this is better than any of the old coffee.'

"We use Postum regularly and never tire of telling our friends of the benefit we have received from leaving off coffee."

Look for the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

On the Sea of Azov

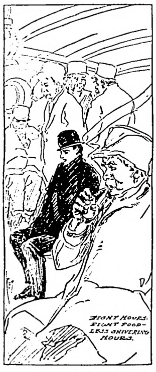
By WARD MUIR

(Copyright, by Short Stories Co., Ltd.)

It is possible that the Sea of Azov sometimes glitters bravely beneath sunshine; but clouds have hung low over its grayish-yellow vastness ever since we first felt our way three weeks ago through the Straits of Kertch; and as far as eye can reach it is dreary—oh, so dreary. A cold wind whistles in the rigging and there is ice on a pool of water in the scuppers. Nasty, fractious, little waves slap our sides, as though trying their best to make us roll and heave like yon pigmy fishing-boat on the port bow. The coast is supposed to be in sight to the northward, but it is low-lying and the mere passenger cannot perceive anything more than a deepening in the heaviness of the sky. The captain tries in vain to make me catch sight of Berdiansk lighthouse and tells me that "over yonder" lies Mariupol. Br-rr-rr-rrh! It's cold, cold! What do I care for Berdiansk or Mariupol? The names are enough for me. I go below and endeavor to comfort myself with a paper-back novel in front of the saloon stove. . . .

What brings me to the Sea of Azov? Heigho, the same demon of unrest which urges one anywhere else, I suppose. Why do you, dear sir or madam, gad off to Cairo or Nice or Munich? Love of change, you say? Good: call it love of change, and I'm with you. But you are rich and I am poor.

I never heard of Taganrog till a month ago, and I don't suppose you have ever heard of it either. Permit me to enlighten you. Taganrog is the flattest, the dullest, the frigidest, the least interesting and one of the richest townships in South Russia. I have been there, so I am an authority on the subject. I am on my way home from Taganrog at this moment—and mighty glad, too. I shall never go there again; that is perfectly certain. I have seen many ports which I should like to visit twice, but Taganrog is not one of them. Taganrog—ugh! The sea of Azov—ugh!



EIGHT HOURS. EIGHT FOOD-LESS SHIVERING HOURS.

Brr-rr-rr-rrh; it's cold!

To call Taganrog a port is to be ultra-polite. We anchored in the port of Taganrog when we were 25 miles from the coast, and never ventured any nearer. For those poor creatures on that fishing-boat, who spend year's end to year's end tossed hither and thither on these ill-tempered waves—

"All the voyage of their life
Is bound in shallows and in miseries."

Both the miseries and the shallows are literally true. The miseries my own shivering can vouch for; the shallows are eloquently testified by the chart which lies on the table beside me. It is a mass of wavy lines and figures signifying soundings and depths—or absence of depth. And at Taganrog, by the quayside, the depth is two fathoms!

Think of it; six feet of water, only, in the harbors of one of the busiest ports of the czar? Isn't it ludicrous? Ludicrous—yes; and very sad.

Look out at the porthole for a minute or two. There! Did you see it? A forlorn-looking stick, peeping from the waves within a stone's throw of your eyes. Cast a glance at the chart, now, and see where the captain ticked off our position half an hour ago. We are plump in the middle of a patch of ocean a hundred miles wide: practically out of sight of land, 30 or 40 miles at least from the nearest cape. Look out at the porthole again. Voila: we have just forged past another of those lonely, sea-splashed sticks. How would you like to descry sticks poking their heads above the swell in mid-Atlantic? Wouldn't it seem a trifle risky, steering a big ship through a puddle in which a 12-foot pole, planted in the mud of the bottom, emerged at the surface? But that is what you must do everywhere in the Azov. The 5,000-ton tramp in which I am comfortably seated just now would immediately touch bottom if she swerved 50 yards to port or starboard. Yet we are going "full speed ahead" to the best of our ability—though, truth to tell, that is only eight knots. We shall plug along at the same pace all through the pitchy night; though the poles which mark the channel are invisible in the darkness. Truly, wonderful is the art of navigation. This absurd trench along which we so gaily steam is in itself shallow. We should scrape our keel if we had a few hundred tons more cargo on board. Indeed, when we reach Yenikale we shall be compelled to unload a great part of our grain, in order to lighten ship, and then reload it all again when we have crossed the bar. Quaint are the methods of the Sea of Azov.

Thus, as I say, though Taganrog is nominally a port, you are hardly within sight of its gold-domed cathedral—and certainly quite out of earshot of its bells—when you anchor in its wind-scourged roadstead. There is something ludicrous in finding yourself one morning at rest "in port," and discovering that land is barely visible. To the crew and the mates, who cannot go ashore, the sojourn at Taganrog while the grain is being loaded must be a dreary interlude. Myself I had some taste of its wearisomeness, for the customs people took three days of persuading before they would let me leave the ship and have a taste of terra firma. It seems I might be an undesirable: an anarchist, maybe; a socialist; a breeder of disturbance; a person likely to do damage to Russia. Passengers are not recognized on a tramp; and at length (with a hint from a kind consul ashore) I posed as a "sick engineer" and demanded the right to consult a doctor. Backsheesh changed hands; an official in top boots and an astrakhan coat grumblingly signed a paper and handed it up to me out of a government tug, and I was at liberty to tread the czar's dominions.

At most ports with which I am acquainted one steps straight from the ship to the dock-side, or merely charters a waterman. But at Taganrog, going ashore is something of an adventure. There are 25 miles of weary sea to traverse, and you must do it in a flat-bottomed tug which, if the wind be contrary, cares nothing for horizontality. Eight hours—eight foodless, shivering hours—did it take me to travel from my dear old tramp to the shore. Never have I been less happy. Never has the wandering mania driven me into less desirable quarters. Sometimes I froze on deck; sometimes I froze in a smoke-reeking, verminous cubby-hole below, crammed with the dirtiest Greeks it has been my lot to encounter. The tug's main business was to supply the ships in the roads with provisions and laborers, and it must needs add now to these duties that of towing a broken-down grain lighter. Its horse-power can never have been excessive. With the lighter straining in its wake, the pace was microscopic.

Brr-rr-rr-rrh: it's cold! But not so cold as when I went ashore at Taganrog. New found ice crackled under our bows as we drew near the coast, and the singular manner in which a whole sheet would instantaneously split for 20 or 30 yards in front of us, making a hospitable liquid lane for our reception, was the sole entertainment I knew that weary day. By the time I crossed the gangway on to the pier I was a wreck, mentally and bodily. It was now three in the afternoon and I had eaten nothing since supper the previous evening; for I had had to rise betimes and neglect breakfast in order to be polite to messieurs the customs men. I had no coat; no luggage; for seafaring men (I was not a passenger, oh, no, by no means—only a sick engineer) seafaring men do not wear coats and need no clean shirts. I had no book or magazine to read. Sick engineers do not waste time on literature. In a word, I was the unhappiest journalist who ever sought copy in earth's forgotten corners.

But, ah, when I reached the sailor's boarding-house to which I had been recommended—behold hot soup with sour cream in it, behold roast fowl—oh, sweetest bird which ever clucked o'er the steppes!—behold bottled beer wherewith to wash it down, and a thimbleful of vodka to warm myself first of all! Glorious, glorious! Taganrog was the loveliest spot on the globe; the Azov the friendliest ocean; Russians the most hospitable of friends. Such is the power of a warm fire and a spread table.

What do I recall clearest of Taganrog? The cold? The abominable journeys in the tug? The cathedral with its ikons and bearded priests? The droskies rattling over the cobbles?

No, sir; these are but dim memories But clear-cut on my mental tablet is the picture of a white cloth with a plate of hot soup upon it; a ring of jolly English sailor faces welcoming me to their boarding-house and asking what was the latest news from "the roads" and their ships, and a hungry, cold man, suddenly cheered with food and heat. Did I say I disliked Taganrog? Nonsense! It is charming.

LIPTON TO CHALLENGE FOR AMERICA'S CUP

Sir Thomas Will Send Yacht to Race This Country's Best in 1911.

Sir Thomas Lipton will challenge for a race for the America's cup to be sailed in 1911. Sir Thomas made this statement just before sailing for Europe on the steamer Lusitania.

Sir Thomas has been here for several weeks to learn the attitude of the members of the New York Yacht club on the question of modification of the rules governing the America's cup. What assurance, if any, he received is not known.

Before sailing, Sir Thomas said:

"I will challenge for a race in 1911. I am sure the New York Yacht club will give the question full consideration. I believe they are just as anxious as anybody else for a race. I would have challenged for a race next summer had it been possible to get a boat ready in time.

"If the New York yachtsmen insist on a challenge under the present rules governing international cup races I would stand no chance to win, and that would not be sport. I shall issue my challenge with the largest type of boat to conform as far as possible with their ideas."

Members of the New York Yacht club said until Sir Thomas' challenge had been formally laid before them no definite statement could be made regarding its acceptance.

Leading members of the club held the opinion that the old racing rules should govern contests for the America's cup.

Plan to Revise Race Rules.

During the Saratoga race meeting it was common gossip, because of certain unpleasant happenings arising out of selling races, that the rules of racing would this winter be amended so as to be of the same character as the rules existing on the French turf. Complaints were frequent that high-priced horses were entered in selling races which were intended only for a very moderate class of race horses. In order to obviate this the method current in France, which permits horse owners or others to claim horses out of selling races before the races are run, will be proposed and may be adopted.

Kroh First on Holdout List.

"I will never play baseball again if I am compelled to go back to Chicago," said Floyd Kroh, the southpaw of the Chicago Cubs, in a Cincinnati interview. "I was promised a certain bonus when I signed with the Cubs in the spring, but when the time came for paying off my envelope was destitute of the amount I was to have received. I don't know or care where I'm sent in 1910, but you can put down a little bet that next season will not find me at the West side park in Chicago as a resident player, no matter if staying away from there keeps me out of the game entirely."

JOY OF THE WILDERNESS

Small Piece of String Would Have Rendered Prospector's Long Journey Unnecessary.

There are situations worse than Gail Hamilton's famous "Twelve miles from a lemon." The man in this New York Telegram item seemed to have found one of them. A party was encamped on the Bear river in eastern Utah, when a prospector came along one morning on a mule. He had his jaw tied up, and at first seemed inclined to pass on without a word. On second thought, however, he halted and gruffly queried:

"How fur to Salt Lake?"

"Three hundred miles."

"Humph!"

"Traveled far?"

"About 200 miles."

"Get your jaw hurt?"

"No. It's just an infernal toothache, and I'm riding 500 miles to get it pulled."

We invited him down and one of the crowd got a piece of string round the tooth and jerked it out as slick as you please. After the overjoyed man had ceased dancing about I queried:

"Why didn't you try the string before starting on such a long ride?"

"Best kind of reason, sir. I hadn't nary a string."—Youth's Companion.

FREED AT LAST

From the Awful Tortures of Kidney Disease.

Mrs. Rachel Ivie, Henrietta, Texas, says: "I would be ungrateful if I did not tell what Doan's Kidney Pills have done for me. Fifteen years kidney trouble clung to me, my existence was one of misery and for two whole years I was unable to go out of the house. My back ached all the time and I was utterly weak, unable at times to walk without assistance. The kidney secretions were very irregular. Doan's Kidney Pills restored me to good health, and I am able to do as much work as the average woman, though nearly eighty years old."

Remember the name—Doan's. Sold by all dealers. 50 cents a box. Foster Milburn Co., Buffalo, N. Y.

Purchasing Power.

A young gentleman of our acquaintance, who had just reached the age of six, was recently waiting with his mother for a train at a railway station, when he noticed a penny-in-the-slot weighing machine. He asked his mother a great many questions about it, and at last received permission to drop in his penny and be weighed. Having obtained that important information, he said: "How much would I have weighed, mamma, if I had dropped in a dollar?"

Dr. S. F. Spohn, President of the Spohn Medical Co., proprietors of Spohn's Distemper Cure, was recently elected mayor of Goshen, Ind., by a good majority. Mr. Spohn was for a number of years County Supt. of Schools, making such a record that his neighbours and friends, regardless of political lines, insisted on his accepting the nomination for mayor.

Refrigerated staterooms are found on three new ships engaged in the fruit service between New Orleans and Colon. Each room is fitted with a cooling "radiator" operated in connection with the refrigerating system that has been installed for preserving fruit in transit.

The Exceptional Equipment of the California Fig Syrup Co. and the scientific attainments of its chemists have rendered possible the production of Syrup of Figs and Elixir of Senna, in all of its excellence, by obtaining the pure medicinal principles of plants known to act most beneficially and combining them most skillfully, in the right proportions, with its wholesome and refreshing Syrup of California Figs.

As there is only one genuine Syrup of Figs and Elixir of Senna and as the genuine is manufactured by an original method known to the California Fig Syrup Co. only, it is always necessary to buy the genuine to get its beneficial effects.

A knowledge of the above facts enables one to decline imitations or to return them if, upon viewing the package, the full name of the California Fig Syrup Co. is not found printed on the front thereof.

A Kneeling Proposition.

"Pony" Moore, the once famous minstrel, is dead at the age of 80. He was one of the last of his kind.

"Moore," said a veteran Chicago manager, "used to make up his jokes. Once, when he played here, he had his toes run over, and limped on that night with a foot that resembled a white pillow.

"'Ah's ez tendah-hoofed as Lize Johnsing,' he said to the audience, with a chuckle. 'Yo' know 'bout Liza? Young Calhoun White, he sez to her, proposin':

"'"Whaffo' you make a face like dat when I propose, Miss Johnsing?"

"'"Well, Cal," says Liza, "Ah kain't give yo' offah propah consideration less'n yo' takes yo' knee off'n mah co'n."'"

The Darky's Idea of It.

A correspondent of the Walker County Messenger tells this one:

"A darky was on trial in the criminal court last week on a charge of bigamy. After the jury has returned a verdict of guilty Judge McReynolds remarked:

"'The best I can do, Crum, is to give you the minimum.'

"'Lordy, mercy me, jedge, don't do dat! I'd rather go to the pen,' said Crum."—Atlanta Constitution.

That this section raises the best dent corn in the world is the opinion of an agent of the Russian government who is buying up seed for his government to be shipped to Russia. The seed chosen was grown in Becker county, and an extra high price paid for it.—Ada Index.

Albert Kaiser, cashier of the First National Bank of Bagley is to be a candidate for the republican nomination for state treasurer Mr Kaiser would certainly add strength to the ticket in the northern part of the state, as he has many warm personal friends that he has made during his long residency in northern Minnesota.

Many of the Iowa and southern Minnesota farmers are at a loss to account for the falling off of their last seasons corn crop, but it would have been easy for them to understand, if they had noticed the great corn belt moving north this season. Come up to northern Minnesota gentelmen, if you want to raise a big corn crop.

Word has been received here to the affect that H.O. Bjorge, of Becker county is trimming his sails for the Ninth district Republican congressional nomination against Halvor Steenerson, who will make the race again. Bjorge was a member of the last two legislatures and was prominent for his connection with tonnage tax bills.—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

We would advise him to not trim his sails to clost, as he will need all the sails spread that he has got, if he goes up against Halvor Steenerson for the Republican nomination for congress in this district.

No Use For A Bridge.

The Thief River Falls papers made much ado over the fact, that John Johnson forded the Red Lake River with a threshing machine, which fully demostrated to the entire satisfaction of said editors that the farmers of the eastern part of the county did not have much use for a bridge accross the river. Another fact which pleased them was that the top of the smoke stack, on the engine was above water and Johnson headed for Thief River Falls to tell about it. Which all looks nice in print, but to come down to solid facts there are thousands of acres of grain on this reservation still standing in stacks, which might have been threshed had there been bridges and roads to move the machines.

All honor to thresher Johnson who risked his life and the loss of a valuable threshing rig in a desperate effort to reach his threshing jobs, and great credit to the newspapers of Thief River Falls for letting the people know, that the farmers of eastern Red Lake county did not need any bridge accross Red Lake River, as they could ford it with a thrashing machine and that the top of the smoke stack on the engine was above water. Enterprising editors them! That take price in publishing all the news and slyly knifeing the territory tributary to them, and about the next sensationl article we expect them to publish would be, that an eastern Red Lake county farmer was sitting on top of the smoke stack of that engine to get across Red Lake River to vote for Thief River Falls for county seat. He would have no use for a bridge! Oh no! he could get across by sitting on top of the smoke stack, and save all public appropriations to build bridges at or near Thief River Falls.

Necessity of Air Baths.

The conditions and conventions of our civilization demand frequent bathing. Any one suspected of avoiding a daily bath would quickly find himself persona non grata in decent society. It is popularly supposed that frequent bathing is essential to health. This is quite untrue. Much of the benefit attributed to the water is in reality due to the complete exposure of the skin to the air. The respiratory function of the skin is of high importance, and, although water may be dispensed with, closing the pores to air would result in speedy asphyxiation.—New York Medical Journal.

A Dreaded Contingency.

A young girl of fourteen was taking a trip on Lake Michigan in a small steamer. The lake was somewhat rough, and many were seasick. The girl sat in the bow and was unusually quiet for her. "Are you feeling sick, daughter?" inquired her father. "No; I don't think I am sick, but I should hate to yawn."—Life.

"Say, old man," began Borroughs, "lend me your ear for awhile, will you?"

Rebuking a Greenhorn.

A whist expert discussed at a dinner those overconfident and foolish persons who think they can learn whist in a year or two.

"Such persons should be called to order," the expert said sternly. "I for one am always glad to see them called to order. A young greenhorn stood behind my partner during a game one night. At the end of the hand the greenhorn said:

"'Why didn't you lead hearts? That's what I'd have done.'

"My partner smiled and answered:

"'Ah, but you, my young friend, have the world before you and none but yourself to consider. You have no wife and family dependent on you for bread, and if you lose heavily no one suffers but yourself. With me it is different; hence I led spades.'"

CAVALRY ON THE MOVE

They Usually Travel at a Walk While on a March.

CAREFUL OF THEIR HORSES.

Reasons Why a Trot or a Gallop Might Prove Disastrous to the Animals. The Wagons and Supplies—Going Into Camp at Night.

People unfamiliar with the marching of troops frequently have the impression that mounted troops usually travel at a trot or gallop while on a march. In the cavalry, however, the gait is usually a walk.

There are reasons why it is not advisable for cavalry to trot or gallop on its road marches. The trooper is required to carry his three weapons—rifle, pistol and saber—over a hundred rounds of ball ammunition, his blanket, shelter tent, canteen, extra horseshoes and sundry other articles, all of which add considerable weight to that of the trooper.

This weight is more or less concentrated at comparatively few points instead of being uniformly distributed over the horse's back, so that at a trot, in spite of all that may be done to avoid it, the concussion at certain points is considerable and if kept up tends to develop blisters and sores on the horse's back, which may increase until the animal is no longer fit to use.

As the supply department furnishes but one horse to each trooper, differing in this respect from the mounts of the cowboy, who has as many as he wants, a constant vigilance is required on the part of the captain while on a long march in order to keep his horses serviceable and prevent his troopers from becoming dismounted.

This he accomplishes in part by marching at a walk whenever the circumstances will admit it. By means of the walk we make four miles an hour, says Captain William F. Flynn, U. S. A., in Forest and Stream, and as twenty-five miles is considered a fair day's march it is thus made in about seven hours, considering the necessary halts. The wagons carrying our supplies can go no faster than that, and there is rarely any advantage in reaching one's camping ground very much in advance of the wagons.

It is customary with individual tourists and campers upon making camp to turn their horses loose and either to watch them or else trust to luck in the matter of finding them again. We are not permitted to do this in the army. We always mean to provide grain for our animals on the march, and when we are unable to buy hay en route and thus have to rely upon grazing we put each horse out on a rope fastened to a picket pin driven in the ground.

On the march each mounted man carries his lariat and pin attached to his saddle and as soon as he unsaddles seeks a good grazing place for his horse and drives his pin in the ground. The horse thus gets a limited area upon which to graze. The pins are changed once or twice during the evening, and as the horse stays all night on his rope he gets a pretty fair chance at the grass, after all, and when we want him in the morning we can find him.

The horses having been unsaddled and disposed of, the men then put up their shelter tents. A shelter tent is a convenient little affair made in two halves to accommodate nicely two soldiers. Each soldier carries his half and his pole with him on his blanket roll attached to his saddle, so as soon as he unsaddles he can select his "bunkie" and put up his tent. The officers' tents are wall tents, carried in the wagons and cannot be put up till the wagons come in.

As soon as that takes place details of men put up the officers' tents, get wood and water for the cooks, and the latter build their fire and at once set about getting supper. Soldiers like to have their food well cooked; but, better still, they appear to like it promptly cooked, and that camp cook is always popular who yells "Come and get it!" just a little sooner than it is expected.

On the march we eat but two meals a day. After breakfast the cooks give each man a liberal sandwich of bacon and bread. This the man incloses in his meat can and when he gets hungry eats it. This constitutes his mid day meal.

Supper over, a guard is posted to look out for the safety of the camp and the other men usually collect fuel, build a rousing fire, gather round it and amuse themselves by singing, telling yarns and cracking jokes upon each other till bedtime, which comes pretty early with men on the march. The officers fill in the time in about the same manner.

On the march one always has to rise early. There are so many things to be done in order to get the cavalcade fairly on the road that early rising is essential. The guard rouses the cooks long before daylight, and by the time the horses are fed and brushed off the cook announces breakfast. After breakfast the tents are taken down, wagons packed, the horses saddled, and the column is once more on the march

Star route mail carriers had desperate hard roads to travel yesterday, with a mixture of from six inches to three feet of mud, snow and water. If they were behind time, or faild to make all of their trip, put on a pair of Skies and go over to the post office and put in a good big "kick." You had ought to be able to get to the post office in safty on skies, if you don't have to deep water to cross, but maybe it would be safer to have a small canvas boat to cross the large bodies of water with. But when you do get to the post office be sure to roast the star route mail driver, for they are the ones that are to blame for these bad roads and weather. Of course they could get through on time, if they wanted to for the most of them are getting such a big salary from the government that they can efford to buy a three hundred dollar span of horses for every swamp they cross.

Death Certificates For Dogs.

The veterinarian was bandaging the leg of a French poodle when the telephone rang, so he asked the visitor to take the message.

"Please tell the doctor," said a woman at the other end of the wire, "that King Charles is dead and we would like a death certificate right away."

The visitor transmitted the news of royalty demise, then added something about the "tomfoolery of getting a death certificate for a dog."

"It may be tomfoolery," said the veterinarian, "but a lot of people with pet cats and dogs are guilty of it. If a real King Charles was dead and I was making out a certificate to file with the board of health I should take no more pains than I shall for that family that has lost a dog. His age and the date of death will be recorded, and the disease that carried him off will be described in detail. Of course the owners of valuable animals are most likely to ask for death certificates, but very often the possessor of an ugly little cur that has crept into his affections wants one too."—New York Sun.

How to Hit.

With one swift, straight right to the jaw the little man had knocked the big, fat bully out completely. Now he was boasting modestly about the matter.

"I learned how to hit," he said, "from Gentleman Jim Corbett. Gentleman Jim claims that in street fighting if you land one clean right you win. But few men know how to hit out straight and clean. They swing. And a swing is no good because it can so easily be dodged.

"To hit out with the right straight and swift—this is how Jim taught me to do it. You step forward with your left foot toward the enemy. You hit straight out with your right arm as hard as you can, at the same time shoving your body forward and pushing off with the ball of your right foot as though you were going to shove the whole earth from under you.

"That is how to land a straight right. It is easy, and it wins every time."

Why He Gave Nothing.

"I've encountered many an excuse for 'sidestepping' the collection basket in church," remarked a Jersey commuter, "but the prize excuse came to me last Sunday out in our town. Next to me in church sat an acquaintance who had taken out a dollar bill, but when he saw the collector was a substitute for the regular brother he put the money back in his pocket. I taxed him with it good naturedly on the way out, and he was very frank.

"'You needn't publish it,' said he, 'but I know that man pretty well. Now, I happen to owe him $5, and he's dunning me unnecessarily for it. I know him so well that I know if I put that dollar bill in the basket he'd find a way to abstract it and pocket it as part of what I owe him. And he'd really feel he was justified too. That's the way he's built, don't you see.'"—New York Globe.

Cindy's Logic.

Cindy was an old black southern "mammy," with all the lovable traits and inconsistencies of her kind. For many years she was cook in the Warren family and gave faithful and satisfactory service.

One summer the entire family were away for two months, and Mr. Warren gave Cindy a real vacation by paying her full wages for that time and giving her the keys to the well stocked storeroom.

A few days after the return of the family Cindy came bristling into Mrs. Warren's sitting room.

"I wants mo' wages," she announced.

"Why, Cindy," exclaimed the surprised mistress, "you are getting better pay than any cook I know of in a family the size of ours. You have a nice, comfortable room and good treatment. Think how kind it was of Mr. Warren to give you a long vacation with your full wages."

"Dat's it," grumbled Cindy. "Mr. Warren paid me dat money fur doin' nuthin'. An' now all you folks is come back fur me to cook fur an' wait on. An' I gits more money or I leaves."—Lippincott's.

A Costly Client.

Miss Bayley told me that Mr Phipps the oculist, told a gentleman who told her, the following anecdote of the late Duchess of Devonshire: Mr. Phipps was sent for to Chatsworth to operate upon the duchess' eye. He stayed there some time and at parting received from the duke a fee of £1,000. Just before he stepped into his carriage a message from the duchess brought him to her chamber. She hoped the duke had done what was handsome by Mr. Phipps. The gentleman protested:

"Yes, and more than handsome."

"It is an awful thing," continued her grace, "to ask, but really I am at this moment in immediate want of such a sum, and if you could, Mr. Phipps."

What could the oculist do? He produced his £1,000, took his leave and never heard of his money from that day to this.—From "Recollections of a Long Life," by Lord Broughton (John Cam Hobhouse).

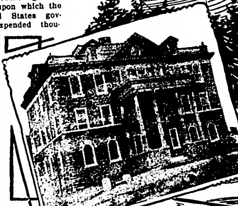
UNCLE SAM TO EXPLORE THE UPPER AIR

BY WALDON FAWCETT

PROF. ALFRED J. HENRY GOVERNMENT SCIENTIST IN CHARGE OF NEW OBSERVATORY



THE NEW LABORATORY AT MOUNT WEATHER

THE KITE AND BALLOON HOUSE

THERE is now nearing completion in the mountains of northern Virginia a weather forecasting outpost upon which the United States government has expended thousands of dollars during the past two years and which is unique in the world. This institution, known as the Mount Weather observatory is one of the most important under the government and when its new buildings are finished and its equipment fully installed this autumn so that the scientists can enter in earnest upon their novel investigations it is believed that this experiment station above the clouds will contribute more than any other factor to increased accuracy in weather forecasting. The new institution is very different from the ordinary weather observatory to be found in every one of our large cities, and it is even dissimilar in scope and function to the headquarters observatory of the weather service at Washington. However, the new observatory will, through the exploration of the upper air contribute greatly to accuracy in weather forecasting in general and will especially point the way to new development in what is known as long range forecasting.

The project of this weather bureau station for upper air exploration is not a new one though the institution in its present guise, and particularly its home, now nearing completion, are of comparatively recent inception. Some years ago the scientists at various United States weather bureau stations and at the Blue Hill observatory near Boston, took up the study of the best methods for lifting self-recording instruments high above the earth's surface. Up to that time all human knowledge of the conditions of temperature, pressure, humidity, wind velocity and direction and other ingredients of the weather had been based upon observations made at or near the surface of the earth. Spurred by the necessity for a better knowledge of temperature and other conditions at great altitudes, the scientists first took up work with ingenious forms of kites, and this was supplemented in 1904 by the use of specially designed balloons as vehicles for carrying the thermometers and other instruments to heights that could not be reached by any other means.

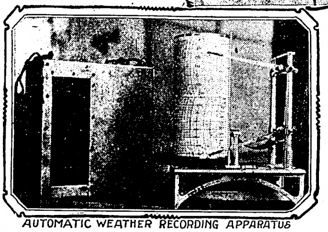
Finally the United States took the lead among the nations of the globe with a project for a special observatory designed for and devoted almost exclusively to aerial research. A piece of land was secured in an isolated part of the Blue Ridge mountains in Virginia, and work was inaugurated on an establishment that is expected to do much to meet the future needs of meteorology and will play a most prominent part in ultimately enabling long-distance forecasting—that is, the forecasting of a type of season rather than the mere prophecies from day to day, such as are now given out. Unfortunately however, the weather bureau was greatly retarded in this new line of work by a disastrous fire which occurred at the newly established observatory on the morning of October 23, 1907, and which resulted in the total destruction of the main building, containing laboratories, offices, etc.

The whole project for this upper air exploration station represents a scheme so new and untried that it was feared for a time that there might be a difficulty in obtaining the appropriations necessary for the rebuilding of the structures needed, but this did not materialize and now the officials are ready to take possession of a new home that is much more complete and pretentious in every way than were the old quarters. More than $100,000 has been expended upon the buildings of this lofty sentinel post—the one and only institution among the weather bureau's 200 station in all parts of the country that is devoted especially to research work. Best of all, most of the new buildings are of the latest approved fireproof construction, so that the safe-keeping of the valuable instruments and the invaluable records to be obtained is well assured.

The restored Mount Weather observatory occupies the same site as the old, namely the tract of 77 acres purchased by the government in the autumn of 1902. As has been said, it is in a decidedly isolated locality, some 20 miles south of Harper's Ferry, and 47 miles in a direct line from Washington. Situated at an altitude of 1,725 feet above sea level on the very crest of the Blue Ridge mountains it overlooks to the west the entire Shenandoah valley from Strasburg to Harper's Ferry, while to the east all that portion of Piedmont, Virginia, between the Blue Ridge and the Bull Run mountains, is in full view. This extensive sweep of valleys, mountains and plains affords rare opportunities for the study of storms, but the construction of large buildings on this somewhat inaccessible site probably presented more puzzling problems for builders and contractors than have been involved in any other governmental undertaking of the kind. Mount Weather, as Uncle Sam has christened his mountain peak, is six miles from the nearest railroad station—that at Bluemont, Virginia. All the building material had to be transported to the observatory site by means of six and eight-horse freighting teams that found hard climbing on the steep mountain road that was specially constructed to give access to this outpost. Moreover, the bricklayers and other artisans who have gone from Washington to construct the new buildings had to content themselves with boarding places miles away from their scene of employment, for there are no habitations, other than those of the weather bureau officials, within some miles of the observatory.

This isolation which, as may be surmised, has had its disadvantages is exactly what the government wanted for its observatory. There are a number of reasons for this. In the first place, the study of the upper air, demanding as it does, the use of kites or balloons, requires a locality with a high average wind velocity—one where sometime during each day there is a strong possibility of having a wind of at least eight or ten miles per hour. It also calls for a location ten miles or more away from cities and electric light wires, since in a populous section loose wires falling down as the result of accidents to kites or ballons in a storm, would prove very troublesome, and even a source of danger. Besides, the surrounding country for 15 or 20 miles should be comparatively open so that lost kites and the costly instruments they carry can be readily recovered. Secondly, magnetic work of the most important character is a feature of the operations of this laboratory, and this requires a location remote from cities. Thirdly, solar investigations which are likewise included in the research work call for a place away from the smoke and dust of cities and above the haze of the valleys. Fourthly, the physical laboratory which is a part of the institution, must be free from the disturbing jars of heavy traffic. Added to all these specifications was the supplementary consideration that it was desirable to have this very important part of the weather bureau's work done as near as practicable to Washington, in order that the central office may be as closely in touch with it as possible. The varied requirements made it no easy task to find an ideal site for the new institution, but the domain finally discovered in the Old Dominion seems to have proven itself possessed of exceptional qualifications.

AFFIXING RECORDING INSTRUMENT TO KITE BEFORE FLIGHT



AUTOMATIC WEATHER RECORDING APPARATUS

One of the principal buildings in the group of new structures recently erected at Mount Weather is the physical laboratory. This is a three-story structure of stone construction throughout, and with immense pillars of solid concrete supporting the portico. The whole building is to be given over to scientific purposes. Departments for the testing of instruments and the invention and construction of all forms of apparatus will be conspicuous features. The third floor of this $30,000 building will be given over to spectroscopic work of the most important character. A short distance from this laboratory building is a handsome frame dwelling of the type usually found in residential suburbs. Since the fire this has served as living quarters for practically the entire staff of Mount Weather, but when work at the observatory is on a permanent status it will be converted into a two-family residence for the use of a couple of scientists who will bring their families to the mountain top.

The main observatory and administration building which will serve, in a sense as the keystone of the Mount Weather group, will cost $45,000 and is a three-story structure of fireproof construction. The first story is constructed of solid concrete, while the upper stories have a facing of brick, backed with terra cotta. Alike to all the buildings at Mount Weather the whole construction and especially the fittings of windows and doors has been planned with especial care in order to afford protection against the high winds that sweep over the mountain in winter. The first floor of the main building is to be given over to offices, while the second and third floors will be occupied for the most part by living rooms for the scientists. Beyond the administration building in the most isolated part of the grounds are two buildings from which the visitor is barred if he carries a watch, or offers a disturbing influence of any kind. These frame structures constitute the magnetic observatory, and contain many delicate instruments.

One of the most important acquisitions of this scientific community amid the mountains is a new central heating and power plant. The power house, of stone and concrete construction, cost with its equipment more than $15,000. It contains a 45 horse power engine, directly coupled to a 25 kw. generator which supplies the current for lighting and heating the buildings; operating the machinery in the laboratories; producing the hydrogen needed to inflate the balloons; making liquid air; and operating the great reel upon which is wound the wire that holds captive the kites and balloons that are sent aloft with recording instruments.

The stone and frame building which served as a power house in the early days of the Mount Weather observatory is now used as a kite and balloon house, and is the headquarters of the five men who devote all their time to aerial work under the general direction of William R. Blair, and with the supervision of Prof. Alfred J. Henry of Washington, the executive officer in charge at Mount Weather. More than 25 kites are constantly kept on hand, including the models used by all the various foreign governments that have undertaken scientific kite flying. There have lately been added to the equipment several specially designed kites for use in the high winds which prevail during the winter. The ordinary kites will fly in any wind with a velocity of ten miles per hour, or more, but are not adapted to use when the wind exceeds 25 miles per hour. However, the new style emergency kite at Mount Weather, weighing eight pounds, and having a lifting surface of 58 feet, has made successful flights more than a mile in height when the wind was blowing a gale of 46 miles per hour.

Fewer balloons than kites are on hand, for the reason that balloons are used only when the wind is too light to permit of kite flying. Originally small rubber balloons were used at Mount Weather, but latterly there have been adopted spherical balloons of varnished cotton cloth which have a capacity of 905 cubic feet, and cost several hundred dollars apiece. Kites have been flown at Mount Weather at the remarkable altitude of 23,000 feet, and captive balloons are frequently sent to a height of several miles. The weather bureau officials are just inaugurating particularly interesting experiments wherein small rubber balloons carrying self-recording instruments of especially light weight are being liberated and allowed to make their own way in the upper air currents. By this way records at elevations of from 30,000 to 50,000 feet will be obtained.

AFFIXING RECORDING INSTRUMENT TO BALLOON

On the kite and balloon field at Mount Weather is a reel house or circular tower mounted so as it can be rotated. Its double doors may thus be made to face in any direction and this facilitates kite flying, no matter what the direction of the wind. The interior of this revolving tower is largely given over to the three horse power electric motor and the monster reel of forged steel carrying the line upon which the kites are flown. The terrific strain involved in kite flying in high winds served to break in quick succession two cast-iron drums which were installed, one after another, at Mount Weather, and each of which gave way under the pull of 20,000 feet of wire, but now the kite flyers have installed a forged steel drum capable of carrying 50,000 feet of piano wire line, and believe that they are prepared for all emergencies.

THE SWEET TOOTH VINDICATED.

Sweetness is to the taste what beauty is to the eye, affirms Dr. Woods Hutchinson—nature's stamp of approval and vindication of wholesomeness. Sugar, says this authority, is one of the most universal flavors of foodstuffs known. One-half of our real foods taste sweet or sweetish. About one-third taste salty. Not more than one-tenth taste either bitter or sour. The experience of millions of years, reaching far beyond even our arboreal ancestors, has taught us beyond possibility of forgetting that, while there are hundreds of things that taste salty which have no food value and scores of things that taste bitter that not only have no food value but are even poisonous, and thousands of things, like leaves and sawdust and coconaut matting, which have no food value at all, there are comparatively few things that taste sweet which are not real foods. A very few of these sweet tasting things, while real foods, are also poisonous, but these we soon learn to detect and beware of.—Current Literature.

BREAKS COLD IN A DAY.

This prescription is one of the very best known to science. The ingredients can be gotten from any good druggist, or he will get them from his wholesale house.

Mix half pint of good whiskey with two ounces of glycerine and add one-half ounce Concentrated pine compound. The bottle is to be shaken each time and used in doses of a teaspoonful to a tablespoonful every four hours. The Concentrated pine is a special pine product and comes only in half ounce bottles, each enclosed in an air-tight case, but be sure it is labeled "Concentrated."

TORE HIS SKIN OFF

In Shreds—Itching Was Intense—Sleep Was Often Impossible.

Cured by Cuticura in Three Weeks.

"At first an eruption of small pustules commenced on my hands. These spread later to other parts of my body, and the itching at times was intense, so much so that I literally tore the skin off in shreds in seeking relief. The awful itching interfered with my work considerably, and also kept me awake nights. I tried several doctors and used a number of different ointments and lotions but received practically no benefit. Finally I settled down to the use of Cuticura Soap, Cuticura Ointment and Cuticura Pills, with the result that in a few days all itching had ceased and in about three weeks' time all traces of my eruption had disappeared. I have had no trouble of this kind since. H. A. Krutskoff, 5714 Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill., November 18 and 28, 1907."

Special Note from Atchison.

The engagement of Mr. Hiram Hardesty and Miss Suzette Snarley is announced. It occurred the other evening at 9:45 on the red sofa in Miss Snarley's parlor. The young lady was dressed in black, and wore no ornaments. She did not look unusually pretty, and what caused the young man's mental aberration is not known. Neither one could remember exactly what was said, and both admitted it was not the first time he kissed her. We print the details for the romantic young things who are always curious to know how an engagement is brought about.—Atchison Globe.

FAVORS STATE RULE

GOVERNOR EBERHART EXPRESSES HIS VIEWS ON PUBLIC POLICIES.

WANTS MORE BUSINESS SPIRIT

Injected Into the Methods of the Various Departments of State Government.

St. Paul.—"I want the state oil and boiler inspection done in a businesslike manner, and when I advocate the abolition of those departments I do not advocate the abolition of the inspection. I think we could have better inspection at less cost."

This statement was made by Gov. A. O. Eberhart to supplement his speech at Minneapolis, in which he advocated a number of reforms which the state might bring about.

'If the law were made stricter and certain standards for oil established and then severe penalties provided for any company selling oil not up to standard, the state would not need to spend $60,000 a year for oil inspection," he explained.

"Boiler inspection could also be improved and made much more businesslike. In some cases the fee is not large enough to cover the cost of the inspector's trip and in many cases the inspector gets big fees for doing little besides political work. The inspection could be put on a business basis, paying the inspector for the work he does and not paying for political work."

WON'T SELL TO INDIANS.

Prosecutions Will Start if Pledges are Violated.

While people in the northern part of the state have been led to believe that the department of the inetrior has stopped all attempt to get evidence against liquor dealers selling intoxicants to Indians, secretary of the Prohibition party has received official notice that special officers have been at work steadily since the first prosecutions and information, sufficient to convict, has been obtained against five dealers at Grand Marais, one of the points at which the illegal trade is said to have centered.

Three officers arrived at that village, which is located on the north shore of Lake Superior in Cook county, about Nov. 1. Aided by residents of the town who had entered complaints, evidence against the places selling to Indians was quickly gathered. In accordance with the policy of the department of the interior, the saloonkeepers were called to the court house and confronted with the evidence.

Instead of starting the prosecution, the special officers presented a complete set of conditions, which bound the dealers not to sell intoxicants to the Indians or to allow Indians in their saloons or barrooms and to immediately give information against any person doing so.

The signatures of every saloonkeeper and bartender in Grand Marais was obtained to the document. This was then sent to headquarters, with the evidence which had been obtained.

Another Conviction at Virginia.

Duluth.—Frank Sadler of Ely, Minn., a miner, was found guilty of murder in the first degree in the district court of Virginia. It took the jury twenty-five hours to agree. Sadler killed Lawrence Kopre at Ely, Aug. 9 last. He had quarreled with Tony Jenko, a companion. He saw Jenko enter Kopre's house and knocked at the door, thinking Jenko would appear. Kopre responded instead and Sadler felled him with an ax. Kopre died a few days later. This is the second conviction for murder in the first degree in the county within a week.

Lad Kills His Sister.

Bemidji. — Louise Gagnon, the little 9-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Victal Gagnon, living near Quiring postoffice, this county, was shot and instantly killed, the result of a mistake of her 10-year-old brother, who aimed a rifle at the little girl and pulled the trigger. The little fellow thought the gun was not loaded.

Dr. Boyd Dead.

Alexandria. — Dr. Harlow James Boyd, one of the prominent surgeons of northern Minnesota, died suddenly, supposedly from a stroke of apoplexy. His death was not discovered by the family until a member went to his room to summon him to the telephone.

Three Injured in Crash.

Duluth. — A coasting bob crashed into an auto. Duetta Esse, Tena Reikow, and Esther Eckholm, were injured. All three are reported in a critical condition. The auto was driven by Herbert Harrold, of Minneapolis.

AKELEY SAWMILL IS BURNED.

Loss Estimated at One Hundred Thousand Dollars.

Akeley.—A fire completely destroyed the saw mill and sorting department of the Red River Lumber company here. The loss is estimated at well up to $100,000. The cause of the fire is unknown. The company is controlled by T. B. Walker of Minneapolis. The fire left the boiler house adjoining the main plant and did not touch the yards.

STATE CORN TO RUSSIA.

Finest Product Desired By European Government.

Minnesota corn will be taken to Russia, for the Russian government, as a sample of the finest corn grown in the United States. Professor Michael, who has been apointed corn breeder for the Russian department of agriculture, will leave Dec. 1, taking the Minnesota product with him.

A. F. Anundsen, president of the First National bank of Detroit, will obtain the corn. The following letter has been written to Mr. Anundsen by Professor P. G. Holden, the noted corn breeder of the Iowa State Agricultural College, Ames, Iowa:

"Professor Michael, whom I have recommended to the Russian government as a corn breeder, has received the appointment. The government has authorized Mr. Michael to bring with him to Russia some of our best varieties of corn. The best Northwestern dent I know of is grown at Detroit, so I am asking you to get a bushel for Mr. Michael. If you can get a bushel each of one or two of your best dent corns, I will appreciate it. The government has made a liberal allowance for the purchase of corn and will pay an extra price for extra selected corn showing breed type. Mr. Michael leaves Dec. 1, so if you could express his corn at your very earliest convenience, it would be appreciated."

Minnesota this year produced 58,464,000 bushels of corn, compared with 46,835,000 bushels the year before, the quality was the finest in the United States at 92 per cent, and the yield per acre the largest ever attained in the state, or 34.8 bushels. This exceeded even the acreage production of the noted corn state, Iowa, which had 31.5 bushels.

MILLION FOR POSTOFFICES.

U. S. Treasury Inspector Tells of New Buildings for Minnesota.

Minneapolis. — "The United States government has appropriated about $1,000,000 for new postoffices in the towns and cities of Minnesota," says Major W. Haverstick, general inspector for the United States treasury department. "Minneapolis will have a fine new building here when the architects get the plans worked out. Other Minnesota towns that will get new buildings are Austin, Alexandria, Brainerd, Crookston, Faribault, Moorhead, New Ulm, Red Wing, Rochester, Virginia and Willmar."

Major Haverstick is here to inspect the federal building, but in concerned only with the operation and equipment of the offices.

"Minneapolis is not getting a new postoffice any sooner than it needs one," he continued. "A tremendous amount of work is required for the construction of a government building. All the plans are made in Washington and every lock and hinge even is accounted for. This all takes time and these outlying towns will not get their buildings for about two years.

EIGHT PERSONS POISONED.

Children at Play Mixed Arsenic With Baking Powder.

Montgomery.—Joseph Edel, a farmer, and his seven children are sick from arsenic poisoning. Some time ago the children, in the absence of their parents, found a package of arsenic which had been placed behind a clock by Mr. Edel after he had used some of it for a horse. The children, thinking it baking powder, emptied it into the baking powder can in the pantry. On Wednesday, Mrs. Edel used it in making biscuits, of which Mr. Edel and the seven children ate freely.

Mrs. Edel did not eat any of the biscuits, as she did not sit down with the rest of the family, but was waiting upon them and doing other work about the kitchen. Everything is being done to save their lives, but as yet the physician cannot tell what the outcome will be.

FARMERS INSTITUTES ARE BUSY.

Successful One Held at Hibbing Yesterday.

Hibbing.—The disagreeable weather did not deter many farmers from coming to town to attend the farmer's institute. The institute opened in the morning and held afternoon and evening meetings.

F. B. McLeren, of Wrenshall, who had charge of the Institute at Cook, was again in charge, aided by C. E. Brown of Elk River; H. K. Larson, of Bernier; A. B. Hostetter, of Duluth, and others, who addressed the assemblage upon farming topics. Today the institute will be held at Eveleth, where the Commercial club is also planning to royally welcome the visitors.

St. Cloud.—Saint Joseph's Catholic Aid Society, at a special meeting adopted a resolution protesting against a caricature of St. Paul which is being displayed in the capital city and which it is planned to exhibit in a celebration. The protest was forwarded to St. Paul and the management was asked to abandon the display of the caricature.

BALLINGER TELLS OF YEAR'S WORK

Report of the Secretary of the Interior Received.

PROBLEM OF PUBLIC LANDS

Development Through Private Enterprise Under National Supervision and Control Desired—Reclamation Service Discussed.

Washington, — —The annual report to the president of Richard A. Ballinger, secretary of the interior, was made public to-day, and makes interesting reading. The report covers a portion of the time under the administration of James R. Garfield, and Mr. Ballinger gives him credit for his earnest and efficient services.

Secretary Ballinger comments on the old public land statutes, and continues:

"The liberal and rapid disposition of the public lands under these statutes and the lax methods of administration which for a long time prevailed naturally provoked the feeling that the public domain was legitimate prey for the unscrupulous and that it was no crime to violate or circumvent the land laws. It is to be regretted that we, as a nation, were so tardy to realize the importance of preventing so large a measure of our natural resources passing into the hands of land pirates and speculators, with no view to development looking to the national welfare.

Must Continue Prosecutions.

"It may be safely said that millions of acres of timber and other lands have been unlawfully obtained, and it is also true that actions to recover such lands have in most instances long since been barred by the statute of limitations. The principal awakening to our wasteful course came under your predecessor's administration. The bold and vigorous prosecutions of land frauds, through Secretaries Hitchcock and Garfield, have restored a salutary respect for the law, and the public mind has rapidly grasped the importance of safeguarding the further disposition of our natural resources in the public lands in the interest of the public good as against private greed. Notwithstanding this, it is necessary to continue with utmost vigor, through all available sources, the securing of information of violations of the public land laws and to follow such violations with rigid prosecutions.

Use Private Enterprise.

"On this present policy of conserving the natural resources of the public domain, while development is the key-note, the best thought of the day is not that development shall be by national agencies, but that wise utilization shall be secured through private enterprise under national supervision and control. Therefore, if material progress is to be made in securing the best use of our remaining public lands, congress must be called upon to enact remedial legislation."

Mr. Ballinger then gives in detail his recommendations for the classification of public lands, and the features of a measure which he advises for the direction of the disposal of water-power sites.

The Reclamation Service.

Concerning the reclamation service, the report says in part:

"In view of the importance of a speedy completion of existing projects and their proper extension, and of the necessity in 1912 of an adjustment between the states by which the major portion of the funds arising from the sale of public lands within each state and territory shall have been expended so far as practicable within such state or territory, and in view of the importance of making a beneficial use of waters already appropriated or capable of appropriation to which rights may be lost for nonuse, I believe an urgent appeal should be made to congress to authorize the issuance of certificates of indebtedness, or of bonds against the reclamation fund, to an aggregate of not exceeding $30,000,000, or so much thereof as may be needed."

Energetic reorganization of the Indian bureau is in progress, says Mr. Ballinger, and he recommends that the Indian warehouses at New York, Chicago, Omaha, St. Louis and San Francisco be closed as soon as possible. A more advanced policy respecting the maintenance, improvement and operation of the Yellowstone and Yosemite national parks is urged on the government.

WESTERN CANADA
Senator Dolliver, of Iowa, says:—
"The stream of emigrants from the United States to Canada will continue."
Senator Dolliver recently paid a visit to Western Canada, and says: "There is a land hunger in the hearts of English speaking people; this will account for the removal of so many Iowa farmers to Canada. Our people are pleased with its Government and the excellent administration of law, and they are coming to you in tens of thousands, and they are still coming."
Iowa contributed largely to the 70,000 American farmers who made Canada their home during 1909. Field crop returns alone during year added to the wealth of the country upwards of $170,000,000.00
Grain growing, mixed farming, cattle raising and dairying are all profitable. Free Homesteads of 160 acres are to be had in the very best districts. 160 acre pre-emptions at $3.00 per acre within certain areas. Schools and churches in every settlement, climate unexcelled, soil the richest, wood, water and building material plentiful.

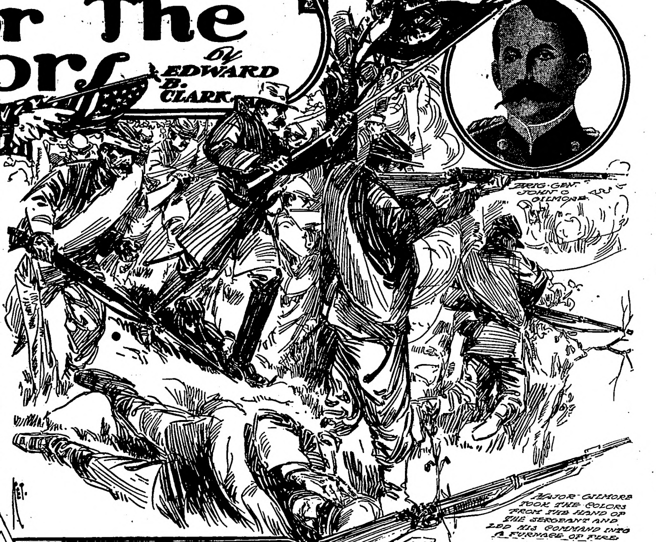
All For The Colors

By EDWARD B. CLARK

Copyright by W. A. Patterson



Brig. Gen. John C. Gilmore

Major Gilmore took the colors from the hand of the sergeant and led his command into a furnace of fire.

IF YOU HAVE an incredible story and are seeking for a gullible one upon whom to unburden it, don't tell it to a marine of the order of Gen. George F. Elliott, of the marine corps of the United States. Gen. Elliott knows a hawk from a handsaw, and also the main brace of the jibboom. He is a man of seasons and service, a fighter, a soldier and sailor in one.

When the first batallion of marines landed in Cuba Elliott was a captain. He was given command of a detachment, a small detachment, with 50 Cubans as an auxiliary, and then he was told to march overland from Guantanamo bay camp to destroy some stores of the enemy at Cuzco. In the light of future events it would appear that the officer issuing the orders should have made some sort of an attempt to find out what Elliott's little band was to meet on the way to carrying out its errand. No soldier, sailor or marine, however, questions orders when they are given to him. Capt. Elliott and his men started out.

The detachment had gone about far enough in the bay to be out of range of ready relief when it was met by the Sixty-fourth Barcelona regiment, a Spanish organization of regulars that had back of it a fighting record extending into the time when Spaniards were trying to get rid of the Moors. Elliott and his men were outnumbered more than five to one, but the captain led his men to the attack and made the day glorious for the yankee marines and Cuban auxiliaries.

The Spaniards fought as well that day as they had ever fought—and there is nothing lame about the Spaniards' fighting methods—but they could not stand the charge of the amphibious soldiers of the northern land. Despite the great odds in their favor, which enabled them to get in about five shots for one, the Barcelona regiment lost in this fight 40 men and officers killed, a much greater number wounded, and 18 men taken prisoners. After the Spaniards had cleared out, thrashed into flight by the American marines, Elliott's command picked up two wagon loads of Spanish rifles on the field of battle.

Lieut. Col. Huntington wrote a few lines about one episode of this fight: "Capt. Elliott's cool advance up a rocky, steep mountain pass, under fire for 20 minutes, without being able to return it, and the gallantry and skill displayed by him throughout this affair, were essential to the great success obtained by the expedition. I earnestly recommend that Capt. Elliott be advanced one grade."

The authorities went Col. Huntington two better. They advanced Capt. Elliott three numbers for "eminent and conspicuous conduct in battle."

Gen. George F. Elliott

After the Cuban affair Elliott became a major and was sent to the Philippines. He was in command of a force of something more than 300 marines and was ordered to attack an insurgent force which was intrenched about the town of Novaleta. Elliott went into a practically unknown country, with no knowledge whatever of the size of the insurgent band which he was to engage. More than this, he knew that the enemy was intrenched, and behind an intrenchment one man, supposedly, is as good as six in front of it. The marines went to their work at Novaleta in an almost jocose spirit. They had been seasoned in war and the fact that they were going against a danger the magnitude of which was absolutely unknown had no effect upon their buoyancy.

Elliott led his men into the fight. They were met right flank, left flank and center with the heaviest kind of firing and the sharpest kind of resistance, showing that the enemy was a multitude and a well armed multitude at that. The marines rushed and won a victory by sheer force of brute strength and man courage. The loss was comparatively heavy, but the result was worth it, for it enabled one force of the army to form a junction with the troops of Gen. Schwann, and this was one of the things desired by the commander in the field. Just after this fight the sun did for Major Elliott what a bullet had been unable to do. A sunstroke dropped him senseless while on duty and he was invalided home.

The marines won a victory by sheer force of brute strength and man courage.

It was George F. Elliott who, with 21 marines and 29 sailors, made a hurry-up march from Chemulpo to Seoul in Korea in order to protect the American consulate and missionaries at that place during the war between China and Japan. At that time Elliott was a lieutenant attached to the U. S. S. Baltimore. News came to the ship that the Koreans were raising the cry "Korea for the Koreans," and were about to massacre all the foreigners at the Korean capital. Admiral McNair ordered Elliott and his little command to take up "double time" across the country and save the missionaries.

It is probable that few military bodies were ever asked to engage in such a trip as that turned out to be. It was so hot that the marines, turning the tables, told the sailors that their belt buckles melted in the sun. Nearly the whole line of the march was through the submerged rice fields, the men being up to their knees in water half the time, their footsteps clogged by plant roots and stems. Under these conditions they made pace at the rate of five miles an hour and they reached their destination in time to perform the service for which the call for the march had been issued.

Gen. Elliott has seen service in all sorts of climatic conditions. He was assigned to the Alliance for her cruise to the Arctic years ago and on the voyage the ship's crew reached the northern point of 80 degrees and 10 minutes, the record up to that time. It was immediately upon his return from the Arctic that Elliott was ordered to the tropics and he saw fighting in Panama, which was then in the hands of the revolutionary forces.

During this Panama service the revolutionists made an attempt to blow Elliott and his command off the face of the isthmus with dynamite. Elliott and a private of the marines caught the man hired to explode the stuff just as he was about to light the fuse. It was perhaps a narrower escape than any which the general has ever had and his narrow escapes besprinkle plentifully his record.

When Brig. Gen. John Curtis Gilmore wears his uniform an inconspicuous bronze medal pendant from an inch of ribbon is his only decoration. It is enough. It is probable that all but one person out of a thousand think that the bronze bit is a corps badge or perchance a sharpshooter's emblem. The general never will volunteer an explanation of the meaning of his medal, but this is what it means: "Medal of honor for distinguished conduct in the battle of Salem Heights, Va., May 3, 1863, in seizing the colors of his regiment and gallantly rallying his men under a very severe fire of the enemy while serving as major, Sixteenth New York infantry."

When in order to hold his men to a work which it seemed past their power to accomplish Major Gilmore took the colors from the hand of the sergeant and led his command into a furnace of fire, he was serving under Gen. Brooke, who was in command of the Sixth army corps. Brooke that day had given his following an example of heroism that was sufficient to keep every officer to the stern line of his duty. Brooke had been wounded. As one of his aides said: "His whole face was shot away." But the general refused even first aid to the injured and remained at his post of command inspiring and directing.

Major Gilmore, because of his comparatively inferior rank was but one small unit in a whole force of fighting units up to the time that need and opportunity came hand in hand across the red field. Major Gilmore met them. The confederates were assailing the whole front of the Union line at Salem Heights. This was on one part of the field of Chancellorsville, where the southern soldiers greatly outnumbered the northern foe. It was in a sense an isolated fight. The confederate attack was at its fiercest on the left flank, which was held by a New York regiment, the One hundred and twenty-first, composed in the main part of recruits. The green ones held their own for a time, but finally were sent back hurtling by the dash and the weight of the enemy.

There was danger that the confederates would turn the flank of the northerners, get a position which practically meant the annihilation of the Union force and would make of that day something more than a mere day of victory.

It came the turn of the Sixteenth New York to go to the attack and to the rescue. The officers of Gilmore's regiment thought that they had estimated properly the numerical strength of the enemy. So they had of that part of the enemy which they had seen, but a road running between two low hills held a force of confederates of which the northerners had taken no account, and from the road the southerners sprang, re-enforced their brethren already in action and attacked, fresh as they were, with an absolute fury.

Gilmore's regiment began to waver. The men had not expected to go against anything like odds so terrific. The sight of three men to one bearing down upon them in addition to the force with which they were actually engaged was enough to make the retreat of the troops more than semi-excusable.

Gilmore, the major in command of one of the batallions, turned things over to his ranking captain and went down the line toward the colors, getting a terrific cross fire all the way. Somehow he escaped the bullets. The color sergeant was standing to his duties and to his flag, but one of the little rules in army regulations makes it incumbent upon a commissioned officer to expose himself to danger at a critical moment for the purpose of rallying and inspiring his men.

Gilmore was a marked man among his soldiers. They liked him and they knew his mettle. He took the colors from the hand of the sergeant and with the "noncom." at his side he advanced in front of the regiment, letting the flag float free, and, calling so that his voice was heard above the noise of the firing, told his men to hold straight on — and hold straight on they did.

The left flank was not turned. The enemy was driven back and the position which it was supposed to hold was held and the hour of defeat was the hour of victory.

When Gilmore was a captain in command of F company he was badly wounded at the battle of West Point. F company under Capt. Gilmore and G company under Capt. Curtis became isolated from the rest of the command and in less than 10 minutes they were surrounded. It was a case where surrender seemed to be the only way out of a bad situation, but Gilmore and Curtis made up their minds that they would fight their way out.

These two officers were close friends. Off duty they were invariably together and the attachment between them was so strong that the men called them "the brother captains." Selecting the point which seemed to be of the least resistance, the two companies, with Gilmore and Curtis at their heads, broke at the encircling host. Within 100 feet of the starting point of the charge for liberty Capt. Curtis went down with a ball through his left breast. Gilmore was shot twice, but he paid no attention to his wounds, and with his men following he went forward at "double time." By sheer force of dash and solidity of impact the two companies went through the confederate line and surrender was behind them. At the next roll call of those two companies about one-third of the men answered to their names.

After the war between the states, Gilmore's record won for him an appointment as second lieutenant of regulars. He joined the Twelfth infantry and saw long and continuous service on the frontier. In 1890 he was assigned to duty on the staff of the adjutant general and at the outbreak of the Spanish war he was made a brigadier general of volunteers.

In addition to his medal of honor for conspicuous personal gallantry in rallying his men at Salem Heights, Gen. Gilmore has three brevet commissions to his credit for gallantry in action. He was breveted major for "gallant and meritorious services in the battle of Antietam, Maryland;" lieutenant colonel for "gallant and meritorious services in the battle of Fredericksburg, Va," and colonel for "gallant and meritorious services throughout the war."

ROMAN RELICS IN BRITAIN

London.—Excavators are at work all over the old world digging up the buried history of peoples and cities whose very existence had long remained only a myth. It is natural, perhaps, that general interest should be more fascinated by the unveiling of secrets hidden for thousands of years than in discoveries of more recent days made at home. Yet year by year enthusiastic bands of workers are bringing to light the buried history of Roman Britain and the results of their labors should be of interest to all who trace their origin to this country.

Roman forts, fortresses, towns and amphitheaters are being worked upon in various places. In Yorkshire an interesting discovery has been made in the last year on the site known as Burwen castle. Here are the scanty remains of a Roman fort covering about five and a half acres. Within the larger enclosure have been found the well-defined remains of a smaller and earlier fort, evidently constructed in the first century.

At Caersus, in Montgomeryshire, the details of a Roman fort covering nearly eight acres have been brought to light—headquarters building, treasury chamber, granary, wells, pits, even the settlement outside the ramparts. A good deal of pottery found there is uncommon and of early date, but no inscriptions have yet been found, except a tile stamp, reading C. I. C. F., which is still a puzzle to excavators of Roman forts.

At Gellygaer, in Glamorganshire, the buildings outside the fort have been uncovered, and at last a date can be assigned to the station, for an inscription has been found of the time of Trajan's fifth consulate, between 103 and 112 A. D.

Interesting work has been done on the great fortress of the second legion at Caerleon, in Monmouthshire. Only three legionary fortresses are known in Britain, and this is the only one from which much definite information as to plan and structure can be looked for. The details of those at York and Chester are probably lost forever.

Work this year on the southern angle of the Caerleon fortress, where the rampart still stands 15 feet high, has disclosed the angle turret in good preservation, with the pointing of the wall picked out in red.

Excavation on the apparently unique Roman station at Holt, near Wrexham, still leaves it doubtful as to what the station was. But the site has yielded one of the most remarkable collections of pottery and tiles in Britain. A heavy stone rampart has been traced for 100 yards, a centurial stone has been taken from it and long rows of buildings have been found. In addition to a striking collection of Samian and other wares, 30 antefixes of the twentieth legion have been discovered in excellent preservation.

For years the excavations on the site of the Roman town of Corstopitum, at Silchester, have added to the knowledge of Roman Britain. This year a building has been found, of which the masonry is finer and more solid than that of any Roman building in Britain. Such a building, it is believed, could only have been erected by the state. The discovery here of pottery which must belong to the first century may materially modify the theories as to the date of the Watling street.

Perhaps the most interesting discover of the year has been the excavation of an amphitheater at Caerleon. Up to the spring of 1909 none supposed this amphitheater, marked by a circular hollow and known locally as King Arthur's Round Table, to be anything more than a bank of earth. The first cuts into the bank revealed an outer wall 5½ feet thick, still standing six and seven feet high in places, and strengthened with buttresses within and without at intervals of 10 feet.

Three entrances have been uncovered, one nine feet wide, leading down to the arena by a vaulted passage. Already one centurial stone has been taken from the wall, showing that the amphitheater was built by the troops themselves. It is estimated that the building would accommodate at least 5,000 spectators, or the number of the garrison of the fortress.

THE POWERFUL 14-INCH GUN.

Regarding the new 14-inch coast-defense gun which has just been completed for the United States government at the Watertown (N. Y.) arsenal the Army and Navy Journal says: "This new gun marks a progressive step in coast-defense ordnance. The powder chamber is even smaller than that of the 12-inch gun, yet while the latter carries a 1,000-pound projectile and has a muzzle velocity of 2,550 feet a second, the new gun carries a 1,600 pound projectile, with a muzzle velocity of 2,150 feet a second. The projectile for the 15-inch gun will carry a much heavier charge of high explosive and will therefore deliver a blow of greater force.

"The relative power of the blow delivered by the two guns is practically as 65 to 74, or it may be said that the 14-inch gun hits about 15 per cent. harder than the 12-inch gun. This power is gained somewhat at the expense of accuracy, as the 14-inch gun will require a higher trajectory. The projectile, traveling less rapidly than that of the 12-inch gun and being heavier, is less subject to the resistance of the air.

"It is probably not extravagant to predict that a single engagement would wear out any of the 12-inch guns we now have. It is calculated that the new 14-inch gun may be fired from 250 to 280 times before any degree of impairment from erosion will appear, whereas 80 shots at the muzzle velocity prescribed would mark the life of our 12-inch guns."

Gossip of People and Events
Gathered in Washington

Caught by Moving Picture Machine

WASHINGTON. — A mighty funny thing happened in Washington recently, and a certain man has not got through explaining things to his wife yet. This man was in Oregon on a business trip a few days before the fight between Johnson and Ketchell at Colma. He had expected to return to the wife of his bosom by a certain date, but instead of that sent a telegram stating that he would have to remain in Portland, Ore., at least two days longer than at first scheduled. He reached Washington according to his revised schedule, and his wife was all the happier to greet him because of his remaining away a little bit longer. The other night one of the enterprising city papers gave a moving-picture exhibition of that particular fight in Colma. This just returned Washington man told his wife that he would like to have her go down town with him and look at the pictures, and she went. The films hadn't been running off but a few minutes when the wife yanked her husband's arm and said: "You see that man in the front seat there. He certainly does look like you."

The man glanced at the front row indicated, and cold shivers ran up and down his backbone. It never had entered his head that there would be anything but just the prize fight to be seen, and he realized in a second that the man on the front seat not only looked like him, but was him. The man, with a jerky little laugh declared, of course, that was just absurd, and that he couldn't see the slightest resemblance to himself in the man on the front seat. The wife kept on watching, however, and positively declined to leave the scene, and her mouth got "sotter and sotter" as she began to realize how her husband had lied to her. Before the end of the third round her husband simply had to acknowledge that the man on the front seat was himself sure enough.

Davis' Speech as a Trust Destroyer

IS MY BILL DEAD?

AS NOTHING of great importance has come before congress, members are putting in their spare time between sessions gossiping and chatting about incidents of the last session, most of the discussions being about the great tariff fight. A joke on Senator Jeff Davis of Arkansas has caused much amusement among the members, some of whom heard it recently for the first time. His speech last session as a trust baiter is cherished as a monumental example of what can be done with the English language when one actually tries. The history of the making of that speech is this:

After breaking all precedents of the senate by making his first speech 11 days after he had been sworn in as a member of that body, Senator Davis rested on his laurels. He went out to Arkansas, leaving his long cherished anti-trust bill in the hands of the senate, having warned that body that he not only wanted action on it, but wanted it quickly. When he finally came back to Washington he was met upon his arrival by Senator Johnson of Alabama, who exhibited a mournful countenance and spoke in funereal tones.

"That 30-day rule has ruined my pet bill," said Johnson.

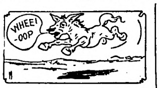
"Thirty-day rule! What is that?" Thundered Davis.

"Haven't you heard about it?" replied Johnson, meekly. "Why, if you fail to get action on your bill within 30 days after you introduce it, it is dead—d-e-a-d."

"What's that?" shouted Davis, almost frantic with rage. "Do you mean to tell me my anti-trust bill is dead? I'll hold my colleague Clarke responsible to the people of Arkansas if that bill died in my absence."

He dashed off without another word in search of his colleague. Naturally Senator Clarke soothed his worked-up feelings by assuring him that his bill was safe, but Senator Davis had had his scare, and then and there began the preparation of his second speech on his bill which upset the traditions and dignity of the senate.

Horse Laughs at the Loco Weed War

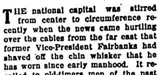


IF horses laugh, and some say there is such a thing as a horse laugh, the noble animal, properly labeled "man's best friend," can utter a merry ha, ha, over the news recently given out by the department of agriculture that war has been declared on the loco weed.

No longer are the mustang and the cayuse of the plains to become "plumb locoed" if the bureau of plant industry has its way. The term "plumb locoed" has been a sort of stock phrase in the range literature ever since the cowboy first noted the peculiar actions of a horse, cow or sheep resulting from an overindulgence in the loco weed, which abounds in the range country from Texas to Montana. The word "loco" is of Spanish origin, meaning crazy, and has been popularly applied to the disease which robs an animal of its muscular co-ordination, causing it to do all sorts of fancy antics, and finally results in the animal starving itself to death.

The bureau of plant industry has been investigating the purple and white loco weed. One of the peculiar characteristics of it is that the pods, when dry and full of seeds, rattle as a person passes through a patch, making a sound that resembles the warning of a rattlesnake. Ordinarily neither horse, cow nor sheep will eat the weed if it can find any other food.

Fairbanks' Shave Recalls Few Others



THE PASSING OF THE SENATORIAL WHISKER

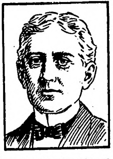
THE national capital was stirred from center to circumference recently when the news came hurtling over the cables from the far east that former Vice-President Fairbanks had shaved off the chin whisker that he has worn since early manhood. It recalled to old-timers men of the past who disported hirsute adornments, the memory of which has become a part of the traditions of the town. There was former Senator Mitchell of Oregon, whose beard dropped to his waist line, and Senator Mitchell of Wisconsin, whose multitudinous whiskers were a topic of discussion in the discourse of nearly every capital guide, and Senator Peffer of Kansas, who frequently carried his long black beard inside of his coat, and many others too numerous to mention.

One day Senator Mitchell of Oregon had his beard removed, and shortly thereafter proceeded to the floor of the senate. A bill was up for consideration in which he was interested. He rose to his feet and addressed the chair. Senator Manderson of Nebraska was presiding. He glanced at the man addressing him, and was about to call for the sergeant-at-arms when he was prompted by a clerk who had sized up the situation. Senators smiled in a perfectly senatorial way, while those in the galleries roared.

The bearded statesman has gone out of style, apparently. Only one such is in President Taft's cabinet. He is James Wilson, secretary of agriculture. There are only a few bearded lawmakers in the senate, among them Nelson of Minnesota, Burrows of Kansas, Cullom of Illinois, Hale of Maine, Scott of West Virginia, and Stephenson of Wisconsin, all of them of the old school.

IN THE LIMELIGHT

KING OF TRUST "BUSTERS"



Frank B. Kellogg is the "king of trust busters." When the federal court stamped the Standard Oil Company as an illegal corporation in restraint of trade and a monopoly which must be dissolved, Mr. Kellogg won one of the greatest legal victories that has ever come to a lawyer. The Standard Oil Company is credited the world over with being the greatest trust of them all. It is not only a trust in itself but it controls other trusts. The Rockefeller millions are invested in many of the other great corporations. The great railway systems of the country are run on the Standard's money. Harriman could have done nothing had the great oil trust so willed. Rockefeller could have shut off his money supply and without the coin of the realm even the late railroad king would have been powerless.

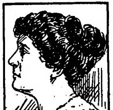
Consequently when the United States court handed down the decision that the Standard must be dissolved it was the hardest blow ever dealt a trust and it was the biggest trust of them all that got the blow.

When Theodore Roosevelt as president, selected Mr. Kellogg as special attorney general to handle the trust busting cases he made no mistake in judgment.

It is probable that Mr. Kellogg could have made thousands and thousands of dollars by being affiliated with one of the giant trusts instead of with the government. He chose however, to stick to Uncle Sam, and now he can rest on his laurels, having beaten the "daddy of trusts" with its lawyers that draw salaries and earn fees that amount to millions. The case is not finished. It will have to go to the supreme court for final adjudication, but good lawyers say Kellogg will win there.

Mr. Kellogg was born in Potsdam, N. Y., December 22, 1856. He went to Minnesota with his parents in 1865, and after serving as county attorney of Rochester county five years, removed to St. Paul where the law firm of Davis, Kellogg & Severance was formed. It was in St. Paul that Mr. Roosevelt found Kellogg.

WOMAN PASTOR SUFFRAGIST



Rev. Georgia R. Ferguson, assistant pastor of the People's church, Washington, D. C., a scholarly, brilliant and beautiful young woman, is attracting much attention by her original plan for the advancement of the woman's suffrage movement.

At a recent meeting of the National American Woman's Suffrage association Mrs. Ferguson submitted a plan which is not militant like that of Mrs. Pankhurst, the English suffragette leader, but is more commonplace and evolutionary.

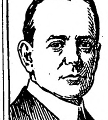
She suggested five special points for an American propaganda as follows:

"That it is not votes, nor privileges, nor rights that count, but what we do with our votes. Action counts—not talk. Political economy is woman's natural province—its generic meaning being 'city housekeeping.'

"Don't force the old parties to take us in against their will, but make them want us. Either start a party of our own, or, better, form ourselves into local committees—autonomous committees drawn from the inhabitants of every principal city and country town in the United States—and practically cover the country and its each and several local needs.

"These committees should be organized to study and report to a representative conference the particular and pressing political necessity of their locality. From these reports at the representative conference the platform should be made up. A platform which should set forth the practical remedies, according to the politcal needs for every portion of the states—which has been made under a direct investigation.

IS RISING YOUNG BANKER

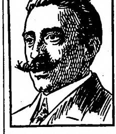


After the meeting of the directors of the Nassau bank in New York, on November 18, 1908, Edward Earl, then the bank's cashier, who, though still a young man, had been in the bank's employ 22 years, was called into the directors' room and informed that he had been made president of the bank, succeeding William H. Rogers, who died a month before.

Mr. Earl's election as president was in accordance with precedent in the bank's policy, its directors having on two former occasions elected as president a man who had been some time in the bank's service.

Mr. Earl was born in Elizabeth, N. J., 39 years ago, the son of W. A. C. Earl of that city. For a time after leaving school Mr. Earl was employed in mercantile pursuits. Then he turned to banking. In January, 1887, he entered the Nassau bank and became assistant bookkeeper. While holding that position he attracted the favorable attention of the late Francis M. Harris, who was at that time president of the bank, and of Enos Richardson, a manufacturer, who took an active part in the affairs of the institution. In 1898 Mr. Earl rose to the position of assistant cashier, and in 1907 to that of cashier. During his long period of service at the bank he has seen its affairs conducted by three presidents: Francis M. Harris, Frank H. Richardson, and the late William H. Rogers.

IS LEADER OF ANARCHISTS



"Spain has two enemies—clericalism and militarism. Freedom of mind is stifled by the degenerate Spanish priests; civic freedom is crushed by the advocates of militarism."

Speaking with flashing eye and emphatic gesture, Senor Vallina, recognized leader of the Spanish anarchist colony in London thus summed up the situation in his native country, following the execution of Senor Ferrer in Barcelona.

"But the responsibility," he continued, "is fixed on King Alfonso, without whose sanction the official murders of progressive leaders in Barcelona could not have taken place. Their blood calls to us for vengeance on their murderers. We will not be satisfied till this has been accomplished and a social revolution brought about in Spain."

Vallina is still on the sunny side of 30, and, like most anarchists, is a mild-mannered man of grave appearance—a most unlikely man, one would think at first glance, to carry terror into reactionary ranks in Spain.

Yet this pale, thoughtful young Spaniard has already suffered much for his advanced opinions. A student in Paris at the time of the attack on King Alfonso in that city four years ago, he was arrested on suspicion of being concerned in it, but subsequently was liberated. Spain and France served notices of expulsion on him and since then he has lived in London, biding his time for the day of reckoning. Few in London, except secret police agents, who shadow him, know to what extent this young student of medicine is committed to the revolutionary cause, for in the free air of England he lives quietly and studiously, close to University College hospital.

Odd News From Big Cities

Stories of Strange Happenings in the Metropolitan Towns

Thought He Was Robbed of Jewels

NEW YORK.—For more than an hour John Dumphy, chauffeur of a taxicab, sped around New York city at night with a trunk containing $35,000 worth of diamonds—and he didn't know what the receptacle contained. And, while Dumphy was taking a man and two flashily dressed women around, Frank Milhenning, member of the firm of J. Milhenning & Co., jewelers of Chicago, was fuming in the Herald Square hotel because he owned the diamonds and the trunk.

It all happened through the mistake of a porter at the hotel. Milhenning had intended to leave New York for Pittsburg. He obtained his tickets and everything was arranged for his transfer, excepting for the care of the trunk containing the gems. He called the colored porter and said:

"Get a taxi, take this trunk, put it in the car and watch it."

The phrase "watch it" was uttered while the jeweler was bending over picking up the trunk—a small one—and doubtless the porter didn't hear it. The man put the trunk in Dumphy's cab and returned to the hotel.

A minute later the well-dressed man and his woman companions came along. The stranger ordered Dumphy to open the door, and the three got in. Dumphy naturally thought his "fare" was the man who had engaged him first, and away he went to the Capitol hotel in Houston street.

Thence he took the trio to other places, where evidently they had urgent business. At One Hundred and Thirty-fifth street and Willis avenue the women alighted and were escorted up a stoop to their home by the man, who then rode to One Hundred and Sixty-sixth street and Prospect avenue, his ultimate destination. The charge was seven dollars. The man paid it and was walking off when Dumphy called out:

"How about your trunk, sir?"

"What trunk?" was the rejoinder.

"This one," said the chauffeur, pointing to the object.

"That's not mine," said the man. "Better look into that matter."

Dumphy, puzzled, returned to the Herald Square hotel, near which he has his "stand." He got in front of the place when suddenly the Chicago merchant rushed at him with two detectives. The chauffeur was taken to headquarters. The trunk was opened and the diamonds found safe.

Pet Pig in Harness Stirs a Hotel

CHICAGO.—Guests of the Palmer house and the diners in the cafe of that hostelry thought it was a murder. There were shrieks and other shiver producers. Men in the lobby straightened out their spines, women guests called the clerk up on the phone and bellboys and porters ran in the direction from which the sounds emanated. When they found the cause of it all everybody had to laugh.

It was just a pig—a small suckling pig.

Bob Conway of St. Louis saw the pig in a window of a restaurant, tied up with a red ribbon and advertising a speciality. The pig had been scoured to immaculate cleanliness. Besides he looked quite cute. Conway decided he must have the pig. So he went in and bought it.

Then he rigged up a harness like a shawl strap, put the suckling within, and proceeded to the Palmer house cafe to meet some friends.

While Conway was en route with the pig, whose squeaks were muffled by his hands, Costello, one of Conway's friends, was perusing the bill of fare. His eyes ran up and down, and finally settled upon "Roast Pig with Apple Sauce."

"Alec, you can give me some pig with the apple sauce," unconsciously remarked Costello.

"All right, boss," said Alec; "It'll take ten minutes."

When the ten minutes were just up in walked Conway with the piggie incased in straps, squirming and desiring to make some sort of a vocal protest, but his mouth was still muffled.

Conway hoisted the pig on the table and put it down on Costello's plate.

"Have some pig?" laughed Conway.

Studied Mesmerism to Boss Husband

HOW TO MESMERIZE A HUSBAND

DETROIT, MICH. — That he would not take his wife with him when he was going to "doings" of the Arab patrol meant exclusively for men, is one of the reasons alleged by Charles W. Coon for his troubles with his wife, Jennie, from whom he sought a divorce.

Another of Mrs. Coon's peculiarities was the reading of a work on "How to Mesmerize Husbands," and consulting fortune tellers. She used to go mostly to a "seeress" on Brooklyn avenue, of whom she said: "She drinks like a fish and swears like a trooper, but she can tell everything."

Coon told Judge Murfin that his wife insisted on dominating him in everything he did and refusing to let him go out unless he took her with him. The final trouble took place at Atlantic City, when the Arab patrol was there. One of the final ceremonies is, when, at the close of the gathering, the members of the different patrols get together and exchange badges. His wife had first insisted on his taking her along, and he had finally consented on her promising not to snub his friends, and particularly a Mr. and Mrs. Judge. She kept her promise as far as bowing to them coldly was concerned, but when he spoke of going out to exchange badges she forbade him to go unless he would take her, too.

Dream of Joy Balked by Bad Burglar

GIMME THE POLICE STATION

CLEVELAND, O. — When George Zuks recently planned to attend a party he purchased a suit of clothes and a handsome overcoat, and took them home and went to bed and to sleep with great anticipations of the event on the morrow. He dreamed how fine an appearance he would make arrayed in his togs. But, alas! it was not to be.

During the night some thief, with a heart as hard as adamant, pried open a rear window and entered the Zuks' domicile. When the dawn broke there was no new suit of clothes, no nifty overcoat hanging in the Zuks clothes closet. They had disappeared most mysteriously. So Zuks, exceedingly wroth, reported the burglary to the police.

Later in the morning Patrolmen Stasney and Soukup called at the Zuks home to get a more accurate description of the missing toggery. They got it and stood sympathizing a minute on the porch, when their attention was attracted to a very happy man on the sidewalk. He was whistling. The unknown seemed burdened greatly by two large packages he carried, but these did not appear to detract any from his light-hearted demeanor.

When he caught sight of the two uniformed officers of the law, however, his jaw dropped, his smile was wiped away by a somewhat covert glance at the policemen from the whites of his eyes. He was arrested and said his name was George Brown.

Zuks had to forego the social affair, because the police held his suit and overcoat as evidence.

"Who are they?"

"Mountain climbers."

LOSSES FROM THE BOLL WEEVIL.

The bulletin of the department of agriculture on the Mexican boll weevil sheds very little new light on the subject. No remedy has been found for that most voracious and destructive insect; and the department merely reiterates its recommendation with regard to the burning of the cotton stalks and the work during the winter looking to keep down the pest—points upon which the southern farmers have been well instructed of late, and which they are thoroughly carrying out. The only gratifying part of the bulletin is the estimate that the amount of damage caused by the weevil is $25,000,000. This is the figure given two and three years ago, when the weevil was restricted to Texas. The damage had grown from year to year up to that time, and it was expected that it would continue to grow as the weevil spread eastward, until it rose to a heavy proportion of the crop. In spite of this spread of the pest, the total loss remains the same, amounting to not more than four per cent. of the crop. Of course, some localities—and Louisiana most of all—has suffered more, but the cotton crop as a whole is not materially reduced by the weevil, and the amount it returns to the southern farmers will be very little cut down.

Secretary Wilson, who has been touring New York state investigating the condition and causes of abandoned farms, says that the trouble is with the farming and not with the farms. The soil is not exhausted. Profitable crops are possible. Scientific knowledge and work are the essentials. Scientific agriculture in the so-called manufacturing states where proximity to urban centers with their markets adds to the value of any crop deserves to be recognized as one of the most important phases of the conservation of resources and of relief from the present burdensome cost of living. The challenger of the beef trust, the dairy product trust, the poultry and egg trust is not the legislator, but the small farmer who is an independent and cannot be bought up.

If anything be needed to prove that the United States is not lacking in esthetic culture, as has been charged so frequently, the recent agitation in Germany, promulgated by Dr. Wilhelm Bode, general director of the Royal Art museums at Berlin, and one of the foremost art connoisseurs of the world, should set at rest all doubts. Dr. Bode sees a dire menace to the art treasures of Europe in the wide-open purses of American millionaires and, in anticipation of a widespread exodus of masterpieces when our new tariff schedule, admitting works of art more than 20 years old free of duty, shall have become a law, is seeking to prevent the threatened spoliation.

A Milwaukee couple want to be divorced—the husband, because his wife insisted on his accompanying her on shopping tours; the wife, because her husband wore neckties that did not match her gowns, says the Baltimore American. With the most sacred of human relations made such a travesty as these absurdly trivial complaints suggest, it is no wonder that the government is collecting divorce statistics which are alarming the thinking men and women of the country for the stability of society.

The dirigible-balloon feature planned in connection with the Hudson-Fulton show, although not officially part of that celebration, proved a lamentable failure. The trouble was that the balloons would not go; at least not far enough to make a really impressive exhibition. The aeroplanes made some successful though less ambitious flights. All of which goes to show that a good deal is still to be done before airships can be relied upon for regular transportation service.

Spelling matches used to be a popular form of entertainment in rural schools, and it was helpful, too, for it made for proficiency in spelling. Boys and girls then learned to spell with their minds instead of spelling always with their eyes from the printed page. There are now many men and women who can write with ease some of the most difficult words in the English language, but without pen or pencil they could not spell some of the simplest words of the language.

If people would not attend football games, automobile races or other performances in which the participants were likely to be killed there would be no such performances. Unfortunately the element of danger continues to make the strongest appeal to a large percentage of our population.

PRESIDENT TAFT SENDS MESSAGE TO CONGRESS

Policy of the Administration Made Clear to the Country.

FAVORS SHIP SUBSIDY BILL

Chief Executive Gives Reasons for Desiring the Passage of Such a Measure—Postal Savings Banks—Plea for Conservation of National Resources.

Washington.—The president transmitted the following message to congress:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The relations of the United States with all foreign governments have continued upon the normal basis of amity and good understanding, and are very generally satisfactory.

Latin America.

One of the happiest events in recent Pan-American diplomacy was the pacific, independent settlement by the governments of Bolivia and Peru of a boundary difference between them, which for some weeks threatened to cause war and even to entrain embitterments affecting other republics less directly concerned. From various quarters, directly or indirectly concerned, the intermediation of the United States was sought to assist in a solution of the controversy. Desiring at all times to abstain from any undue mingling in the affairs of sister republics and having faith in the ability of the governments of Peru and Bolivia themselves to settle their differences in a manner satisfactory to themselves which, viewed with magnanimity, would assuage all embitterment, this government steadily abstained from being drawn into the controversy and was much gratified to find its confidence justified by events.

On the ninth of July next there will open at Buenos Aires the fourth Pan-American conference. This conference will have a special meaning to the hearts of all Americans, because around its date are clustered the anniversaries of the independence of so many American republics. It is not necessary for me to remind the congress of the political, social and commercial importance of these gatherings. You are asked to make liberal appropriation for our participation. If this be granted, it is my purpose to appoint a distinguished and representative delegation, qualified fittingly to represent this country and to deal with the problems of intercontinental interest which will there be discussed.

The Argentine Republic will also hold from May to November, 1910, at Buenos Aires, a great international agricultural exhibition in which the United States has been invited to participate. Considering the rapid growth of the trade of the United States with the Argentine Republic and the cordial relations existing between the two nations, together with the fact that it provides an opportunity to show deference to a sister republic on the occasion of the celebration of its national independence, the proper departments of this government are taking steps to apprise the interests concerned of the opportunity afforded by this exhibition, in which appropriate participation by this country is so desirable. The designation of an official representative is also receiving consideration.

The Pan-American policy of this government has long been fixed in its principles and remains unchanged. With the changed circumstances of the United States and of the republics to the south of us, most of which have great natural resources, stable government and progressive ideals, the apprehension which gave rise to the Monroe doctrine may be said to have nearly disappeared and neither doctrine as it exists nor any other doctrine of American policy should be permitted to operate for the perpetuation of irresponsible government, the escape of just obligations or the insidious allegation of dominating ambitions on the part of the United States.

Beside the fundamental doctrines of our Pan-American policy there have grown up a realization of political interests, community of institutions and ideals and a flourishing commerce. All these bonds will be greatly strengthened as time goes on and increased facilities, such as the great bank soon to be established in Latin-America, supply the means for building up the colossal intercontinental commerce of the future.

My meeting with President Diaz and the greeting exchanged on both American and Mexican soil served, I hope, to signalize the close and cordial relations which so well bind together this republic and the great republic immediately to the south, between which there is so vast a network of material interests.

I am happy to say that all but one of the cases which for so long vexed our relations with Venezuela have been settled within the past few months and that, under the enlightened regime now directing the government of Venezuela, provision has been made for arbitration of the remaining case before The Hague tribunal.

Since the Washington conventions of 1907 were communicated to the government of the United States as a consulting and advisory party, this government has been almost continuously called upon by one or another, and in turn by all of the five Central American republics, to exert itself for the maintenance of the conventions. Nearly every complaint has been against the Zelaya government of Nicaragua, which has kept Central America in constant tension and turmoil. The responses made to the representations of Central American republics, as due from the United States on account of its relation to the Washington conventions, have been at all times conservative and have avoided, so far as possible, any semblance of interference, although it is very apparent that the considerations of geographic proximity to the canal zone and of the very substantial American interests in Central America give to the United States a special position in the zone of these republics and the Caribbean sea.

I need not rehearse here the patient efforts of this government to promote peace and welfare among these republics, efforts which are fully appreciated by the majority of them, who are loyal to their true interests. It would be no less unnecessary to rehearse here the sad tale of unspeakable barbarities and oppression alleged to have been committed by the Zelaya government. Recently two Americans were put to death by order of President Zelaya himself. They were officers in the organized forces of a revolution which was in control of about half of the republic, and as such, according to the modern enlightened practice of civilized nations, they were entitled to be dealt with as prisoners of war.

At the date when this message is printed this government has terminated diplomatic relations with the Zelaya government, for reasons made public in a communication to the former Nicaragua charge d'affaires, and is intending to take such future steps as may be found most consistent with its dignity, its duty to American interests and its moral obligations to Central America and to civilization.

Department of State.

I earnestly recommend to the favorable consideration of the congress the estimates submitted by the department of state and most especially the legislation suggested in the secrtary of state's letter of this date, whereby it will be possible to develop and make permanent the reorganization of the department upon modern lines in a manner to make it a thoroughly efficient instrument in the furtherance of our foreign trade and of American interests abroad. The plan to have divisions of Latin-American and Far-Eastern affairs and to institute a certain specialization in business with Europe and the near east will at once commend itself. These politico-geographical divisions and the detail from the diplomatic or consular service to the department of a number of men who bring to the study of complicated problems in different parts of the world practical knowledge recently gained on the spot, clearly is of the greatest advantage to the secretary of state in foreseeing conditions likely to arise and in conducting the great variety of correspondence and negotiation. It should be remembered that such facilities exist in the foreign offices of all the leading commercial nations and that to deny them to the secretary of state would be to place this government at a great disadvantage in the rivalry of commercial competition.

The consular service has been improved under the law of April 5, 1906, and the executive order of June 27, 1906, and I commend to your consideration the question of embodying in a statute the principles of the present executive order upon which the efficiency of our consular service is wholly dependent.

Expenditures and Revenues.

Perhaps the most important question presented to this administration is that of economy in expenditures and sufficiency of revenue. The deficit of the last fiscal year, and the certain deficit of the current year, prompted congress to throw a greater responsibility on the executive and the secretary of the treasury than had heretofore been declared by statute. This declaration imposes upon the secretary of the treasury the duty of assembling all the estimates of the executive departments, bureaus and offices of the expenditures necessary in the ensuing fiscal year, and of making an estimate of the revenues of the government for the same period; and if a probable deficit is thus shown, it is made the duty of the president to recommend the method by which such deficit can be met.

The report of the secretary shows that the ordinary expenditures for the current fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, will exceed the estimated receipts by $34,075,620. If to this deficit is added the sum to be disbursed for the Panama Canal, amounting to $38,000,000, and $1,000,000 to be paid on the public debt, the deficit of ordinary receipts and expenditures will be increased to a total deficit of $73,075,620. This deficit the secretary proposes to meet by the proceeds of bonds issued to pay the cost of constructing the Panama Canal. I approve this proposal.

In order to avoid a deficit for the ensuing fiscal year, I directed the heads of departments in the preparation of their estimates to make them as low as possible consistent with imperative governmental necessity.

Civil Pensions.

I am aware that there is a strong feeling in both houses of congress, and possibly in the country, against the establishment of civil pensions, and that this has naturally grown out of the heavy burden of military pensions, which it has always been the policy of our government to assume; but I am strongly convinced that no other practical solution of the difficulties presented by the superannuation of civil servants can be found than that of a system of civil pensions.

Frauds in the Collection of Customs.

I regret to refer to the fact of the discovery of extensive frauds in the collection of the customs revenue at New York city, in which a number of the subordinate employes in the weighing and other departments were directly concerned, and in which the beneficiaries were the American Sugar Refining Company and others. The frauds consisted in the payment of duty on underweights of sugar. The government has recovered from the American Sugar Refining Company all that it is shown to have been defrauded of. The sum was received in full of the amount due, which might have been recovered by civil suit against the beneficiary of the fraud, but there was an express reservation in the contract of settlement by which the settlement should not interfere with, or prevent the criminal prosecution of every one who was found to be subject to the same.

Criminal prosecutions are now proceeding against a number of the government officers. The treasury department and the department of justice are exerting every effort to discover all the wrongdoers, including the officers and employes of the companies who may have been privy to the fraud. It would seem to me that an investigation of the frauds by congress at present, pending the probing by the treasury department and the department of justice, as proposed, might by giving immunity and otherwise prove an embarrassment in securing conviction of the guilty parties.

The Tariff Act.

Two features of the new tariff act call for special reference. By virtue of the clause known as the "maximum and minimum" clause, it is the duty of the executive to consider the laws and practices of other countries with reference to the importation into those countries of the products and merchandise of the United States, and if the executive finds such laws and practices not to be unduly discriminatory against the United States, the minimum duties provided in the bill are to go into force. Unless the president makes such a finding, then the maximum duties provided in the bill, that is, an increase of 25 per cent. ad valorem over the minimum duties are to be in force. Fear has been expressed that this power conferred and duty imposed on the executive is likely to lead to a tariff war. I beg to express the hope and belief that no such result need be anticipated.

The discretion granted to the executive by the terms "unduly discriminatory" is wide. In order that the maximum duty shall be charged against the imports from a country, it is necessary that he shall find on the part of that country not only discriminations in its laws or the practice under them against the trade of the United States, but that the discriminations found shall be undue; that is, without good and fair reason. I conceive that this power was reposed in the president with the hope that the maximum duties might never be applied in any case, but that the power to apply them would enable the president and the state department through friendly negotiation to secure the elimination from the laws and the practice under them of any foreign country of that which is unduly discriminatory. No one is seeking a tariff war or a condition in which the spirit of retaliation shall be aroused.

Needs of the Navy.

The return of the battleship fleet from its voyage around the world, in more efficient condition than when it started, was a noteworthy event of interest alike to our citizens and the naval authorities of the world. Besides the beneficial and far-reaching effect on our personal and diplomatic relations in the countries which the fleet visited, the marked success of the ships in steaming around the world in all weathers in schedule time has increased respect for our navy and has added to our national prestige.

Injunctions Without Notice.

The platform of the successful party in the last election contained the following: "The Republican party will uphold at all times the authority and integrity of the courts, state and federal, and will ever insist that their powers to enforce their process and protect life, liberty and property shall be preserved inviolate. We believe, however, that the rules of procedure in the federal courts with respect to the issuance of the writ of injunction should be more accurately defined by statute and that no injunction or temporary restraining order should be issued without notice, except where irreparable injury would result from delay, in which case a speedy hearing thereafter should be granted."

I recommend that in compliance with the promise thus made appropriate legislation be adopted. The ends of justice will best be met and the chief cause of complaint against ill-considered injunctions without notice will be removed by the enactment of a statute forbidding hereafter the issuing of any injunction or restraining order, whether temporary or permanent, by any federal court, without previous notice and a reasonable opportunity to be heard on behalf of the parties to be enjoined; unless it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court that the delay necessary to give such notice and hearing would result in irreparable injury to the complainant and unless also the court shall from the evidence make a written finding, which shall be spread upon the court minutes, that immediate and irreparable injury is likely to ensue to the complainant, and shall define the injury, state why it is irreparable and shall also indorse on the order issued the date and the hour of the issuance of the order. Moreover, every such injunction or restraining order issued without previous notice and opportunity by the defendant to be heard should by force of the statute to expire and be of no effect after seven days from the issuance thereof or within any time less than that period which the court may fix, unless within the injunction or order is extended or renewed after previous notice and opportunity to be heard.

Second-Class Mail Matter.

The deficit every year in the postoffice department is largely caused by the low rate of postage of one cent a pound charged on second-class mail matter, which includes not only newspapers but magazines and miscellaneous periodicals. The actual loss growing out of the transmission of this second-class mail matter at one cent a pound amounts to about $63,000,000 a year. The average cost of the transportation of this matter is more than nine cents a pound.

It appears that the average distance over which newspapers are delivered to their customers is 291 miles, while the average haul of magazines is 1,049, and of miscellaneous periodicals 1,128 miles. Thus, the average haul of the magazine is three and one-half times and that of the miscellaneous periodical nearly four times the haul of the daily newspaper, yet all of them pay the same postage rate of one cent a pound. The statistics of 1907 show that second-class mail matter constituted 63.91 per cent. of the weight of all the mail, and yielded only 5.19 per cent. of the revenue.

The figures given are startling, and show the payment by the government of an enormous subsidy to the newspapers, magazines and periodicals, and congress may well consider whether radical steps should not be taken to reduce the deficit in the postoffice department caused by this discrepancy between the actual cost of transportation and the compensation exacted therefor.

A great saving might be made, amounting to much more than half of the loss by imposing upon magazines and periodicals a higher rate of postage. They are much heavier than newspapers and contain a much higher proportion of advertising to reading matter, and the average distance of their transportation is three and a half times as great.

Postal Savings Banks.

The second subject worthy of mention in the postoffice department is the real necessity and entire practicability of establishing postal savings banks. The successful party at the last election declared in favor of postal savings banks, and although the proposition finds opponents in many parts of the country, I am convinced that the people desire such banks, and am sure that when the banks are furnished they will be productive of the utmost good.

Favors Ship Subsidy.

Following the course of my distinguished predecessor, I earnestly recommend to congress the consideration and passage of a ship subsidy bill, looking to the establishment of lines between our Atlantic seaboard and the eastern coast of South America, as well as lines from the west coast of the United States to South America, China, Japan and the Philippines. The profits on foreign mails are perhaps a sufficient measure of the expenditures which might first be tentatively applied to this method of inducing American capital to undertake the establishment of American lines of steamships in those directions in which we now feel it most important that we should have means of transportation controlled in the interest of the expansion of our trade. A bill of this character has once passed the house and more than once passed the senate, and I hope that at this session a bill framed on the same lines and with the same purposes may become a law.

Conserving National Resources.

In several departments there is presented the necessity for legislation looking to the further conservation of our national resources, and the subject is one of such importance as to require a more detailed and extended discussion than can be entered upon in this communication. For that reason I shall take an early opportunity to send a special message to congress on the subject of the improvement of our waterways, upon the reclamation and irrigation of arid, semi-arid, and swamp lands; upon the preservation of our forests and the reforesting of suitable areas; upon the reclassification of the public domain with a view of separating from agricultural settlement mineral, coal, and phosphate lands and sites belonging to the government bordering on streams suitable for the utilization of water power.

Political Contribution.

I urgently recommend to congress that a law be passed requiring that candidates in elections of members of the house of representatives and committees in charge of their candidacy and campaign file in a proper office of the United States government a statement of the contributions received and of the expenditures incurred in the campaign for such elections and that similar legislation be enacted in respect to all other elections which are constitutionally within the control of congress.

DEEP-SEATED COUGH CURED IN FIVE HOURS.
New Home-Made Syrup.
(Cut this Out.)
From Boston Post.

Progress in medical compounds never ceases, and now it is stated by a prominent medical man that any deep-seated cough or cold on the lungs can be actually cured in five hours by the clock. Opium or morphine have been resorted to in the past, as relief measures. But now it is learned that the system must be treated to rid it of inflammation and congestion. A tonic laxative cough syrup does the work so quickly and thoroughly as to be almost magical. What heretofore has taken weeks to cure can be accomplished in hours. Get this formula filled or mix it at home and always keep it on hand: One-half ounce fluid wild cherry bark, one ounce compound essence cardiol and three ounces syrup white pine compound. Shake the bottle and take twenty drops every half hour for four hours. Then take one-half to one teaspoonful three or four times a day until the system is purified and toned up. Give children less according to age. One filling will usually cure a whole family, as the dose is small.

WESTERN CANADA
FREE

"The greatest need of this country [United States] in another generation or two will be the providing of homes for its people and producing sufficient for them. The days of our prominence as a wheat exporting country are gone. Canada is to be the great wheat country."
This great railroad magnate is taking advantage of the situation by extensive railway building to the wheat fields of Western Canada.
Upwards of 125 Million Bushels of Wheat were harvested in 1909. Average of the three provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba will be upwards of 23 bushels per acre.
Free homesteads of 160 acres, and adjoining pre-emptions of 160 acres (at $3 per acre), are to be had in the choicest districts.
Schools convenient, climate excellent, soil the very best, railways close at hand, building lumber cheap, fuel easy to get and reasonable in price, water easily procured; mixed farming a success. Write as to best place for settlement, settlers' low railway rates, descriptive illustrated "Last Best West" (sent free on application), and other information, to Sup't of Immigration, Ottawa, Can., or to the Canadian Government Agent.

NEW RAILWAYS IN CENTRAL CANADA

AMERICAN SETTLERS WELCOME AND DOING WELL.

The Portland Oregonian, of Portland, Oregon, published a cartoon on the immigration of U. S. people to Canada, in its issue of October 5, 1909. The picture was accompanied by the following article:

"Losing American Citizens. The exodus of American farmers to Canada continues to be a phenomenon of the first importance. More of them are crossing the border this fall than ever before, and they are flocking from all parts of the country. Formerly it was the Middle West alone which thus lost the heart of its citizenship. Now all sections of the Union suffer alike. The regret which we cannot help feeling over the migration of many thousands of excellent citizens has an economic side which causes some concern. The 70,000 farmers who will go to Canada to live this fall will take with them some $70,000,000 in cash and effects. This is by no means a negligible sum, and makes a very appreciable drain on our resources. But, of course, the most serious loss is the men themselves and their families, who have forsaken the land of the free and the home of the brave to dwell under the rule of a monarch.

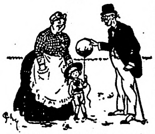
Why do they go? Naturally the cheap and fertile land of Western Canada attracts them. Each emigrant goes with a reasonable expectation of bettering his fortune. Indeed, in a few years he may grow rich through the abundant crops he can raise and the increase of land values. But perhaps that is not the sole reason for the astonishing migration. There is a common notion abroad that in Canada life and property are appreciably safer than they are here. Murders are not so frequent, and are more speedily and surely punished. Mobs and the so-called 'unwritten law' are virtually unknown in Canada. Again the law is a vastly more ascertainable entity there. Canada does not permit its judges to veto acts of the legislative body. When a statute has been enacted it is known to be the law of the land until it is repealed. this naturally imparts to Canadian civilization a security and stability which we have not yet attained.

"We must remember, in the same connection, that the Canadian protective tariff is far less exorbitant than ours, and much less boldly arranged for the benefit of special favorites. Hence there is an impression, very widely diffused, that the Canadians are not so wickedly robbed by the trusts as we are in this country. Reasons like these sufficiently account for the exodus of a body of citizens, whom we can ill afford to lose, but they do not much assuage our regret that they cannot be retained in the United States."

Speaking of this, a Canadian Government representative says that the Americans who cross the border are most welcome. The splendid areas of virgin soil, a large quantity of which is given away as free homesteads, lie close to existing railways and to those under construction. The railway lines that are assisting in this development are the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific. The latter is built entirely on Canadian soil, and has opened up a wonderful stretch of land. Along this line during the year about closed thousands of American settlers have made their homes. They have built the towns, and immediately began as factors in the building up of the great Canadian West.

Agents of the Government are located in various cities throughout the United States who will be pleased to give any information that may be desired to further the interest of the settler.

ODD MISTAKE.



Short-Sighted Old Gentleman—How your little boy has grown! But you shouldn't let him go out without a hat.

FOR OLD PEOPLE.

After reaching the age of forty the human system gradually declines. The accumulated poisons in the blood cause rheumatic pains in the joints, muscles and back. These warnings should be promptly relieved and serious illness avoided by using the following prescription which shows wonderful results even after the first few doses and it will eventually restore physical strength.

"One ounce compound syrup of Sarsaparilla; one ounce Toris compound; half pint of high grade whiskey. This to be mixed and used in tablespoonful doses before each meal and at bedtime. The bottle to be well shaken each time." Any druggist has these ingredients or can get them from his wholesale house.

Envy.

"I envy the good-natured man," said the philosopher.

"So do I," answered Mr. Sirius Barker. "His good nature indicates that the desirable things of life are coming his way."

WAGNER IS THE KING DECLARES JOE TINKER

CUBS' SHORTSTOP PLACES THE PITTSBURGER ON HIS ALL-AMERICAN TEAM.

Joe Tinker, shortstop of the Chicago Cubs was editor for one day of a paper in Butte, Mont., recently, and had some interesting things to say about baseball and the players.

Most interesting of all the several stories which not only bear Joe's signature, but the earmarks of genuineness, is that in which he picked an All-American baseball team and justified every selection by practical instead of theoretical arguments. Here is the team picked by Tinker:

Cobb, right field.
Speaker, center field.
Clarke, left field.
Chance, first base.
Evers, second base.
Wagner, shortstop.
Lord, third base.
Gibson and Archer, catchers.
Brown, Mathewson, Walsh, Overall and Adams, pitchers.

After discussing the merits of the others Joe, who is a shortstop of the first water himself, says this about Wagner:

"Now we come to the greatest ball player who ever stepped on to the diamond. There is no one to compare with Wagner. He is beyond anything that ever attempted the game. He is the grandest all-'round ball player in the business. He is the greatest hitter of them all, fields wonderfully and is one of the brightest stars on the bases. He is not a player who is a sensation one year and then falls to come back. He is always there and is always on top."

Joe Tinker.

Wagner has been praised for his work before, but no better judge ever lauded his ability. If Tinker, who is certainly second only to Wagner, can say such nice things about the big German, then certainly Hans is the star of them all.

BRADY DEFIES JIM JEFFRIES

Offers to Give Former Champion $10,000 If He Will Fight Al Kaufman.

W. A. Brady's offer to present $10,000 as a gift to James J. Jeffries and then bet $10,000 on the side if the latter will meet Al Kaufman in the ring within 90 days has been pronounced "bunk" and "a joke" by Jeff's manager, Sam Berger, who says there is no public demand for such a match.

But Brady declares that he means business and that Jeffries can win his money by defeating Kaufman in a ten round bout, not 20 rounds, as at first stipulated. Jeffries, who seems to be embarrassed, declares that Brady is airing some fancied grievance against him and is also looking for advertising.

Tearney Heads Three I.

Al Tearney, president of the Chicago Amateur Managers' association, was elected president of the Three-I league to succeed Mike Sexton, chief executive of the National association. The election of Tearney was another victory for Dick Kinsella of Springfield and his cohorts. J. Hayes of Davenport was elected vice-president of the league. There also was a committee of three, consisting of M. H. Sexton of Rock Island, R. Johnson of Peoria and J. Hayes to revise the constitution of the organization. The salary limit was raised to $2,000 a month for each team of 14 players and a schedule of 140 games, starting April 28, was agreed upon.

Fitz to Fight Again.

It was announced in Sydney, N. S. W., that "Bob" Fitzsimmons and "Bill" Lang had agreed to fight in Australia on December 27, for the championship of Australia now held by Lang. Lang won this title by defeating "Bill" Squires at Melbourne on October 25. Squires was knocked out in the twentieth round. Fitzsimmons recently arrived in Sydney from the United States.

Donlan Refuses Big Salary.

Thirty thousand dollars a year failed to lure Mike Donlin back to baseball. The former Giant captain and right fielder said that Felix Isman of the Phillies had offered him this amount every season to manage the team, but that he had turned it down.

SIXTY-FIRST CONGRESS MEETS

Speaker Calls the House to Order and Is Applauded by Friends and Enemies Alike.

Vice-President Sherman Presides Over the Senate---Numerous Bills Designed to Carry Out President Taft's Policies Are Introducd in Both Houses.

By EDWARD B. CLARK.

Washington, Dec. 6.—The Sixty-first congress of the United States met at noon to-day for the first day of its first regular session, with Vice-President Sherman in the chair of the senate, and Speaker Joseph G. Cannon in the chair in the House. While this congressional gathering is the first regular session, it is the second session in reality, for congress met in extraordinary session last spring at the call of President Taft to consider the matter of a revision of the tariff.

Some interest was lacking in the proceedings of the first day in the capitol because at the beginning of the extraordinary session in March last the speaker of the House was elected. Moreover, before the extraordinary session was ended, Speaker Cannon appointed all the committees which are to take legislation under consideration for the next two winters. The appointment of the committees ended the campaign on the part of the members for choice chairmanships and, if the chairmanships were not forthcoming, for seats in the more important subsidiary bodies of the Hous.

Ready for Work at Once.

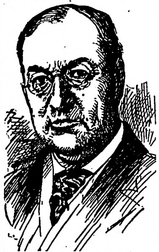
The members have had time to get over jealousies and rivalries and so is that, so far as committee work is concerned, the House not only is ready to proceed at once to consider legislation, but most of the members have brought themselves into a frame of mind to do what they are called upon to do without regard to their past feelings of disappointment and perhaps, anger.

As is always the case on the opening day of congress, admission to the House and Senate galleries was by card and only those fortunate enough to know senators and representatives sufficiently well to secure admission tickets were allowed to witness the proceedings.

Galleries Are Crowded.

The galleries of both House and Senate were jammed with people. All classes of Washington society were represented in the throng of visitors. The diplomatic gallery in the House and in the Senate as well, was filled to its fullest capacity with ambassadors, ministers, attaches and the ladies of the different legations. Members of the families of the president and of the vice-president of the United States occupied seats in the executive galleries; and the cabinet and judiciary and army and navy circles were well represented.

By a rule which was adopted not long ago, flowers are barred from the floor of the House excepting when they are to be used as a tribute to the memory of some deceased member. The result of this rule is that now on the opening days of congress the desks of the members are bare of floral decorations. In the old days both House and Senate were turned into conservatories for the time of the opening proceedings.



Vice-President Sherman.

At sharp noon Speaker Cannon called the House to order and asked the chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, to offer prayer. In his prayer which was in a sense a Thanksgiving offerering, the chaplain referred to the prosperity of the country, the opportunities of the present and the bright hopes and promises of the future.

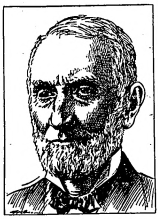
Absentees Are Few.

As soon as the prayer was ended the clerk of the House called the roll of membership by states and it was found that there were only a few absentees. The roll call ended the reading clerk of the Senate who had appeared in the House was recognized, and he announced that the Upper House had passed a resolution to inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate being assembled, that body was ready to proceed to business. The House also was told that the Senate had appointed a committee to join a House committee to inform the president of the United States that a quorum of each house was present and that congress was ready to receive any communication that he "may be pleased to make." On receipt of this message from the Senate, Speaker Cannon appointed a committee to join a like committee of the Senate to wait upon the president. The members of the body directed to notify Mr. Taft that the House was in session were by the appointment of the speaker, the Republican leader, Sereno E. Payne, and the Democratic leader, Champ Clark.

The first day in the House as usual brought out hundreds of legislative measures in bill form, all of which were read by their title only and then referred to the proper committees. It was evident from the tone of the bills introduced that some scores of representatives were anxious to father measures which had been recommended by President Taft as being necessary to carry out proposed policies of progression. The bills ranged from those intended to correct alleged existing evils in interstate commerce to those to give increases of pensions to veterans of the civil war.

Applause Greets Speaker Cannon.

If Speaker Cannon anticipates any particular trouble with the "Insurgents" of the House at the coming session, he gave no evidence of it when he took the chair as presiding officer. He was greeted with great applause from the galleries and from the floor of the House, many of the Democrats and insurgents joining in the demonstration, though in either case possibly the hand-clapping was given as an evidence of regard for the office of speaker, rather than as evidence of any overweaning affection for the speaker himself.



Speaker Joseph G. Cannon.

With the committees ready to begin work, the House will settle down to its winter's business at once. No bills will be passed immediately because all measures must be considered in committee, and the meetings of the committees will be held daily from now until the Christmas holidays and some of the more important House bodies will sit during the recess. When congress reassembles in January many of the committees will be ready to report bills, and the debates of the winter will begin.

Opening of the Senate.

Vice-President Sherman called the Senate to order at noon. Rev. Edward Everett Hale, the chaplain of the Senate, having died during the summer recess, his place as chaplain, temporarily, was taken by a local clergyman who offered prayer. In the Senate the roll was called and it was found that nearly all the senators were in their seats. The resolutions were adopted to the effect that committees be appointed to inform the House and the president that the Senate had assembled and was ready to begin the business of the session. As was the case in the House many bills were introduced for consideration during the winter by senators who, like the representatives, desire to have a hand in forwarding administration policies.

After a comparatively short session "in the open," the galleries were cleared and the Senate went into executive session behind closed doors for the purpose of considering nominations for office sent to the Upper House by President Taft.

Tests of Diamonds.

Most persons are obliged, in the purchase of a diamond, to rely implicitly upon the word of the man who sells the stone. While many years of observation and experience are needed to become an expert with respect to the value and purity of diamonds, yet there are certain extremely simple tests capable of being made by the most inexperienced.

One is by means of a needle hole pricked through a piece of ordinary cardboard. Looking through the stone tested at the cardboard, one will see two holes if the diamond be spurious—only one if the gem be genuine. The reason for this is that an imitation diamond will give a double refraction, the real stone but one refraction.

It is claimed that there is no acid having any perceptible effect upon a genuine diamond. Hydrofluoric acid will, if dropped upon a stone made of glass, corrode it, but upon the bona fide stone it will have no effect at all —Harper's Weekly.

Women's Secrets

There is one man in the United States who has perhaps heard more women's secrets than any other man or woman in the country. These secrets are not secrets of guilt or shame, but the secrets of suffering, and they have been confided to Dr. R. V. Pierce in the hope and expectation of advice and help. That few of these women have been disappointed in their expectations is proved by the fact that ninety-eight per cent. of all women treated by Dr. Pierce have been absolutely and altogether cured. Such a record would be remarkable if the cases treated were numbered by hundreds only. But when that record applies to the treatment of more than half-a-million women, in a practice of over 40 years, it is phenomenal, and entitles Dr. Pierce to the gratitude accorded him by women, as the first of specialists in the treatment of women's diseases.

Every sick woman may consult Dr. Pierce by letter, absolutely without charge. All replies are mailed, sealed in perfectly plain envelopes, without any printing or advertising whatever, upon them. Write without fear as without fee, to World's Dispensary Medical Association, Dr. R. V. Pierce, Prest., Buffalo, N. Y.

THE SUNBEAM,

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Red Lake County Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam' Minn under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879

There is not much prospect of the threshing being finished in this part of the county before spring, as the weather is keeping up its bad record.

There is one bad feature about Pennington county and that is the County Commissioner they have given us up here. If it should happen that he did not agree with the other members of the board on some small question he would resign and come home, and leave us without any Commissioner at all.

Chief Officer Johnson of the U.S. Indian service is closing up the saloons in northern Minnesota at a rapid rate. He has got as far west as McIntosh in Polk county, and Fosston, Langeby and Bagley will have to close their saloons. There is one lesson that the saloon men have learned and that is; when Johnson says, "close up your saloons." They shut up shop, and "go way back and sit down." Lots of this trouble might have been avoided, if the saloonmen had not persisted in selling whiskey to the Indians and they'are working west. First comes the Indians and buy the wiskey, then comes Johnson and closes up the saloons. It is easy to tell when Johnson is coming, for the Indians are always ahead of him trying to buy wiskey. Sell it to them! There won't any one find it out until Johnson arrives, then he won't do much only to close up your saloons.

Some of the early Deer Park settlers will undoubtly be surprised to hear that the famous Swan Johnson, killed near Bemidji some two weeks ago by officers was the same Swan Johnson who camped at the George Singer farm five years ago, on a hunting trip. Him and his partner Lenard, who was up here with him at that time, robbed a store of $240,00, and he was shot and instantly killed after he had shot and badly wounded one of the officers, and old Lenard made his escape. It is rather poor policy to become to warm bed fellows with strangers for you can not tell what kind of criminals you may be sheltering, although these men seemed to be honest in Deer Park.

Although it is early in the game, there is no question of doubt that there will be a warm campaign in Red Lake county next year, for in addition to other local county questions at issue, there is likely to be a fight made by Thief River Falls to divide the county. There will not be any party politicts mentioned, so far as county officials are concerned, for they will not be asked whether they are Democrats, Republicans, Socialists, or Prohibitionist, but "how do you stand on county division."Which ever way he answers he is sure to be kifed by the other fellow, and he can't stand in with both sides for he is sure to get caught at it and then neither side would vote for him. About the safest way for him to do would be to have placards printed which read; "I am deaf, and dumb," but that might not do either for the farmers might wonder why a deaf and dumb man was running for office. But he might overcome this by getting a phonograph and have it loaded up with his story in all the different languages spoken in the county, and have it wind up with the statement that he was sure to recover his speech and hearing in November. Then start out looking for votes, and when you see a man you think would take an interest in your story just motion to him to get in hearing of the phonograph. then turn it loose and let it load him up, and as soon as the machine runs down hand him a card and drive on. Be sure to not stop to answer any written questions, for if you do the first question he will ask is, how are you going to vote on county division? You may think this only a joke, but it is the best and surest way to get elected in this county next year.

Shakespeare's House.

The house in which the master poet was born is located in Henley street, Stratford-on-Avon, England. Washington Irving said of this famous abode of genius: "It is a small, mean looking edifice of wood and plaster, a true nestling place of genius, which seems to delight in hatching its offspring in by-corners. The walls of its squalid chambers are covered with names and inscriptions in every language by pilgrims of all nations, ranks and conditions, from the prince to the peasant, and present a simple but striking instance of the spontaneous and universal homage of mankind to the great poet of nature."

Several years ago the house was purchased by subscription with a view to the careful preservation of it and of its contents for the inspection of future generations.

Tuning a Bell.

No matter how great may be the care taken in making the mold, a bell has to be tuned before it will ring a clear, true note. As a matter of fact, every bell sounds five notes, all of which must blend together harmoniously. If one is the least bit out the tone will be spoiled. The first of these notes is produced by the vibrations at the mouth of the bell, the second by the vibrations a little higher up, the third still higher up, and so on to the fifth, which is produced quite near the top. As the character of the sound which rings depends upon the thickness of the metal, it is possible, by taking thin shavings from various places in the inside of the bell, to alter the five notes until they are all in harmony.

The Lure of the Arctics.

Polar life brings strange revelations. A man who is a model of amiability at home is a savage in those high latitudes, where Mother Nature and humanity seem bent on revealing their crudest characteristics. When a man goes to the arctics first he dislikes it. If he is caught there one winter he vows to himself that he will never repeat the adventure. Yet when he gets back home he discovers that the "white silence" has a compelling fascination. I have never known a man who could resist the chance to go again, even at a financial loss. After twenty years of experience, if another opportunity came to me, it is doubtful whether any consideration would prevent my taking up the work again. Once the charm of those long months of daylight, the mysterious deathly silence of those long nights, the white glare of that brilliant moonlight across trackless wastes of snow and ice, has been felt a man is unable to resist the siren call of the north that has become more to him than family, home, friends or money. Gladly he takes his life in his hands and fares forth again into those frozen seas.—Captain Edwin Coffin of Ziegler Polar Expedition in National Magazine.

Bear Ague.

"Speaking of 'buck fever,'" said a survey official, "reminds me of 'bear ague.' Never heard of it, eh? Well, I first encountered it in Wrangel narrows, Alaska, a number of years ago. We were on the old surveying steamer Patterson.

"Just as we rounded a point of land not more than 200 yards distant a big black bear was seen on the beach looking at us. Eight men took up rifles at once and were about to shoot when I told them to wait and fire all at once in a volley when I gave the order. They all took careful beads on the beast. 'Ready, fire!' I shouted.

"There was a rattle of musketry as the eight pieces were discharged, and every one looked to see the animal's death throes. There was the bear running up the hill as lively as a jack rabbit. Not a shot had hit him. Bear ague, that's all. Every man's hand was trembling so he couldn't hit a house. Buck fever's nowhere alongside of it."—San Francisco Call.

Her Vocal Selection.

A wedding was recently held which was of the fashionable kind, and there were all sorts of preparations and frills. Among the "features" was a song by a baritone singer of considerable local renown, and just what he was to warble was a matter of considerable discussion.

A little sister six years old of the bride took much interest in the program. "Sis," she said, "I want to sing at your wedding."

"No, dear; you can't sing," was the rejoinder.

"But I can, and I want to," she pleaded.

"What would you sing?" her father asked her.

"'Heaven, Look With Pity!'" was her rejoinder, and her father hasn't got over it yet.—Kansas City Journal.

Ladies First!

"Scratch a southerner and you find a knightly soul" might be said to be one of the morals of the Chicago Record-Herald story below. The second moral is reasonably obvious:

"What is the reason," began the irritated traveler from the north, "that the trains in this part of the country are always behind time? I have never seen one yet that ran according to its schedule."

"That, suh," replied the dignified Georgian, "is a mattah that is easily explained. It is due to southern chivalry, suh."

"Southern chivalry! Where does that come in?"

"You see, suh, the trains are always late in this country because they wait for the ladies, God bless them!"

The Patient Man.

Mr. Henpeck had hesitated a long while about doing this bold thing, but he felt that now was the time or never. "Dear," he said, in a very timid voice, "I wish you wouldn't call me 'Leo' any more."

"Why not?" demanded his wife explosively. "'Leo' is your given name."

"I know, my dear, but it makes my friends laugh when you call me that; I was thinking you might call me 'Job,' just for a pet name."—Catholic Standard and Times.

One Beauty of Classical Music.

Miss Gush—Do you like classical music, Mr. Sourdropp?

Mr. Sourdropp—Yes.

Miss Gush—Oh, I am so glad! Do you not find in it great inspiration, sublime thought and true beauty?

Mr. Sourdropp—Not exactly. I like it because no blithering idiot can beat time to it with his foot.

Matrimony Made Easy.

"Can a fellow marry comfortably on a salary of $500 a year?" asked the young man.

"Sure, he can," replied the sage of Sageville—"that is, provided he has saved his last year's salary and can get his employer to pay the next year's in advance."—Chicago News.

Not Games of Chance.

The Vicar—Is it true, Samuel, that your father allows games of chance to be played at your house? The Boy—There ain't no chance about it, sur—they all cheats!—London Opinion.

Circumstantial Evidence.

"De Villers has quit scorching."

"Machine all in?"

"Nope; he's dead."

"Oh, that doesn't prove anything."—Harper's Weekly.

Our school teacher Miss Skeie is preparing a programme to be given by the school scholars, and all who attend may be sure that they will pass a pleasant Christmas eve. Opprotunity will be given to all to place presents on the tree for their friends, and all are invited.

Our school board received notice yesterday that the school had been obliged to ajourn on account of cold weather, and Walter McAndress and W. G. Hunt went over to the school house and changed the style of that famous heating plant, that was bought by the first board of directors of this district, after it had been thrown away by Thief River Falls, and was never fit to use in any other place than a cold storage, or a smoke house.

Owing to the impassiable condition of the roads the basket social at the school house on Saturday evening was not largely attended, but those who did brave the weather and bad roads were well repid for their trouble by haveing a good time. The girls had some very pretty baskets made which sold for rather fancy prices, and a neat little sum was added to our school library fund after paying all expenses Mr. and Mrs. Walter McAndress served coffe and provided extra lunch for those who did not get lunch baskets, so that all were well provided for.

Theaters of Different Ages.

The difference between the playhouse in which we see a drama of Bronson Howard's today and the playhouse in which Sheridan's comedies were originally acted is greater than the difference between Sheridan's Drury Lane and the house for which Congreve wrote and in which Betterton acted. And that restoration playhouse was very unlike the Elizabethan theater for which Shakespeare wrote and in which Burbage acted. Even more apparent is the difference between the theater of Dionysius at Athens and the Roman theater at Orange. These theaters are sharply distinguished from one another by their size, by their shape, by their methods of illumination, by the absence or presence of real scenery and by the arrangement of the seats for the spectators, and as we study these successive changes we are confirmed in the conviction that these physical conditions must have exerted a powerful influence upon the dramatists who followed one another down the centuries.—Brander Matthews in Century.

Wisdom In Fable.

Among the best things that have ever been written are the Aesop's fables, which date back to the sixth century B. C. They present human nature as it always has been, is and probably always will be. Take, for example, the story of "The Fox Without a Tail:"

"A fox was once caught in a trap by his tail and in order to get free was obliged to leave it behind. He knew that his fellows would make fun of his tailless condition, so he made up his mind to induce them all to part with their tails. At the next assemblage of foxes he made a speech on the uselessness of tails in general and the inconvenience of a fox's tail in particular, declaring that never in his whole life had he felt so comfortable as now in his tailless freedom. When he sat down a sly old fox rose and, waving his brush, said, with a sneer, that if he had lost his tail he would be convinced by the last speaker's arguments, but until such an accident occurred he fully intended to vote in favor of tails."

Peculiar Superstitions.

The people of Kulu are extremely superstitious and go in extensively for demonolatry. Many trees are held to be sacred and have tiny temples dedicated to them. The demons are popularly supposed to live at the tops of trees, and if a tree falls in such a way that it is possible to pass under it, as is often the case on the mountain sides, every man before going beneath the trunk will place on it a stick or stone to propitiate its guardian spirit. Certain streams are also sacred, and no one is allowed to wash dirty clothes in them. One year some strangers came into the valley and happened to pollute the water of a river in this manner. It chanced to be a year of extraordinary rainfall, and the people implicitly believe that the excessive rain was sent by the outraged "depta" of the stream as punishment. —Wide World Magazine.

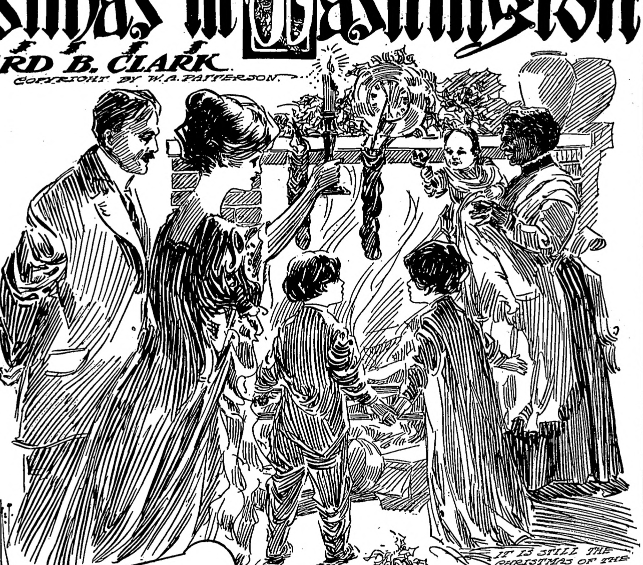
Christmas in Washington

BY EDWARD B. CLARK

COPYRIGHT BY W. A. PATTERSON.



IT IS STILL THE CHRISTMAS OF THE CANDLE-LIGHT AND OF THE BLAZING LOG

THE Potomac river does not mark the boundary between the southern and northern Christmas. The spirit of the holiday season of the south makes itself felt through the District of Columbia, through Maryland and well into Pennsylvania. Here it is still the Christmas of the candlelight and of the blazing log, the Christmas of the distinctive old England cheer.

It is probable that there has been a Christmas tree in the White House at every holiday season in every administration excepting that of Theodore Roosevelt. Old residents of Washington say that even the bachelor and the widower presidents had Christmas trees to remind them of their own childhood, or to be used as an attraction for specially invited children guests.

President Taft's youngest child, "Charlie," is of Christmas tree age and inclination. Both the president and his wife are young in heart, and the Christmas tree has always had a place in their holiday merrymaking. The president's two older children, Robert and Helen, are in college, the one at Yale and the other at Bryn Mawr. Like all other college students who can make the journey home, the president's older children are with their parents.

Christmas in the White House is very much like the Christmas in the homes of all American families. When there are children in the great colonial mansion stockings are hung up, and the expectation and excitement of Christmas eve are just as great as they are in any of the humbler homes in the land. Christmas is a home day for the president and his family. All business is given over, and the White House clerks and employes, to say nothing of the cabinet officers and the senators and representatives who make daily journeys to the president's office, know that on Christmas day of all the days in the year the president wishes to throw off the cares of state and to have the same privilege that any other American citizen may have—the privilege of enjoying his family and of partaking with it undisturbed of the Christmas cheer.

It has been said that there was no Christmas tree at the White House in the holiday seasons when Theodore Roosevelt was president. There were six children in the Roosevelt family, all of them of Christmas tree age when the colonel of Rough Riders became president. There were always happy times at Christmas in the Roosevelt household, but the Christmas tree was barred because the president being a strong advocate of the preservation of the forests, thought that it was little less than a sin to cut down trees and of necessity kill them, in order to use them for merely decorative purposes.

It is said that on one occasion the youngest boy of the household had a tree give nhim, and thinking that inasmuch as it was already cut down he might as well keep it, he put it in the closet off his room and there surreptiously trimmed it. It is also said that his father discovered the tree. but the historians of the household do not know, or at any rate do not say, what happened then, and so the end of one story of a former Christmas tree celebration in the executive mansion must forever remain unknown.

THE NEW FRENCH EMBASSY AT WASHINGTON, D.C. SCENE OF THE ANNUAL CHRISTMAS PARTY.

In this Potomac river section where the old time Virginia Christmas spirit still dwells, there is an openness about the holiday that is like the openness of the Virginia home. Perhaps—but here the ready doubter probably will interpose objection—it is the transmitted spirit of the old days still indwelling in the hearts of the inhabitants—the spirit of the cavalier who generally made too free with his means of inward cheer, but with whose "vices" charity always kept pace.

The war did not kill Christmas in Virginia. It survived battle and poverty and it is as happy and lusty to-day as it was in the seasons when the slaves brought the oak logs to the firing. It is the great feast of the south and of the northern country which lies adjacent to the Mason and Dixon line.

Washington is on the dividing line between most things northern and southern, but the Washington Christmas is wholly of the south. The markets of the city are fat and dripping. The marketmen sell and sell, and yet the stores of Christmas things seemingly never dwindle. It is the season of game. Washington reverses the rule of New York and Chicago. Its holiday markets give the quail and the canvas-back the places of honor, while the chicken and the turkey stay in the shadow.

It may be, and probably is true, that the wild ducks no longer darken the water of the lower Potomac with the close-flying flocks of former years; it may be that the quail, the Virginia partridge, numbers its kind by hundreds where once it numbered it by thousands; it may be that the Virginia deer, the deer of the woods of eastern North America, is fast passing; but no evidence of an approaching or an accomplished scarcity is to be found in the markets of the southern cities or in the homes of southerners who keep Christmas as their forefathers kept it.

The Christmas of that part of Virginia which lies close to Washington is still the Christmas of other days, but warning has come of a change. Northern capital and northern capitalists are entering the state and the candle light and the blazing logs are giving way to electric light and steam heat which are as alien to the Old Dominion home as are the liveried lackies who soon will displace the old "uncle" and the old "mammy" in the "quarters."

The steel man and the packer are invading Virginia to become neighbors of the men who have been lords of the soil since the days of the first Lee. The change, mayhap, will not be congenial to the invader, and so, possibly, Virginia will not be sorry if this specific kind of northerner recrosses the Potomac.

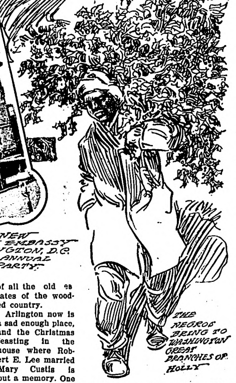
Virginia, the District of Columbia and Maryland have the holly habit. The holly has grown here in profusion from the day that no man knows, but it will not continue to grow unless there is a reform in habit and in law. The negroes bring to Washington great branches of the holly, hacked from the parent stem with darky disregard for saving anything. The holly trees are among the chief beauties of the Potomac hills. They are going the way of other trees of the Appalachian range, and before long it will be necessary for the lawmakers to follow the lead of the Massachusetts legislature which was compelled to intervene to save the trailing arbutus, the mayflower, from the hand of the vandal.

No part of the country perhaps can claim a monopoly of the natural beauties of the season, but there is a glow about Christmas in this semi-southern country that is not found in the colder north. It may be the glow of externals only, but it appeals to the eye and to the sympathy. Out-of-doors there are contrasts in the Potomac regions that are not to be found farther north except in sections where the evergreens abound. The mountains are white topped, and below them in the valleys are the dark greens of the holly, the laurel and the wild honeysuckle, and the dark browns of the oaks whose leaves do not fall before the spring comes.

Scattered through the country south of Washington are old plantation homes still occupied by the families who have held them since the days of the colonies. There seems to be a general belief in the north that most of these old places are forsaken and desolate, but there are many, more than the city dweller knows, still remaining prosperous and showing scarcely a trace of change as the result of age.

It was said the other day by an old southerner in Washington that no home-loving Virginian ever would move "until after the next Christmas." The next Christmas comes and goes, but there is still another to come, and the moving is put off, and will be put off until the holiday spirit has gone from the south—a spirit that will go when the south goes.

Arlington, the old home of the Custises and of Robert E. Lee, is standing as it has stood for a century. It is situated just across the Potomac river from Washington, and it is typical of the old mansion homes of Virginia. The grounds of Arlington to-day are a national cemetery, but their beauty is characteristic of that of all the old estates of the wooded country.



THE NEGROES BRING TO WASHINGTON GREAT BRANCHES OF HOLLY

Arlington now is a sad enough place, and the Christmas feasting in the house where Robert E. Lee married Mary Custis is but a memory. One does not have to travel far, however, through the state of the Carters, the Boyds, the Pendletons and the Randolphs, to find in this holiday season the scenes of cheer that once gladdened Arlington.

Washington makes the most of Christmas. In its feasting and thanksgiving it is a thoroughly southern city at the holiday season. It has its cheer and its charity in full measure and these things together make "A Merry Christmas."

"CHRISTMAS GIFT" An Ancient Custom

When the universal Christmas hold-up confronts you, don't explode.

Refuse, if you want to; but don't dwell in your thoughts upon the increasing depravity of the human race; don't exalt the rugged independence of our forefathers.

You may not yield cheerfully to the spirit of the season when the time comes to remember the office boy, the bootblack, the hotel waiters, the restaurant force, the ashman, the garbage man, the messenger service, the newsboys and others. Somehow you picture the Christmas "hold-ups" of bygone days, when a daring highwayman barred the progress of the lumbering stage coach and coolly took his toll.

Christmas largesse is almost as old as Christmas.

In the south, if you happen to be in any section that preserves even a modicum of the old-time atmosphere, you are liable to encounter everywhere, on Christmas morning, from such negroes as have some claim to knowing you, the familiar phrase:

"Chris'mas gif'!"

It means, as one of the class favored by fortune, from you the less lucky are free to ask Christmas largesse, and that with no sinking of independence, with no sacrifice of self-respect.

The custom does assume the superiority of a giver—does, indeed, assume it not very far from the level of overlord and serf. But that is because it has passed through the slough of slavery, which was serfdom, in literal fact.

At any rate, the custom goes back at least to the sweetest and most touching of Yuletide doings in England, the Christmas carol. That, too, came first into being when serfdom was England's common law, when the lord of castle and of keep was serenaded by his dependents, and, in his munificent turn, gave them lordly largesse to drink his noble health.

But the beginning was not then. Farther and farther back we must go, carol and of the song of England—even back to days of the wandering singers—the jongleurs and the minstrels, who came from Normandy with conquering William, and were gentlemen adventurers as independent as you please, and very ferocious fighters in the bargain.

So the "Christmas gift," in the course of the ages has had its ups and downs, ranging from the lordly acceptance by a titled minstrel of plain yet royal wages to the humble appeal of the dependent serf, whose welfare was at his overlord's will and pleasure. The spirit in which, at various periods, it has been given and received was really what determined its social significance; and there have been times when that spirit was precisely the spirit of the most polite highwayman who ever bade startled traveler stand and deliver.

The Christmas waits of England, with their "God rest you, merry gentlemen; let nothing you dismay," soon established the precedent that, wherever they chose to intone their carols before a door, that door must open to them hospitably, and a table must be furnished forthwith with good things of the season for their prompt refreshment.

But there were curmudgeons among them then as there are now. Persons who happened to have other pleasures on their hands, and realizing keenly that the jovial waits came uninvited, could not perceive why anyone should play reluctant host. The curmudgeons unquestionably had the right of it, but the carol singers, many a time, burst in doors and wrecked house furnishings in their wrath at the refusal. There was a Christmas hold-up in grim reality.

"Christmas gift" isn't altogether bad, as it isn't altogether new. It is only a recrudescence of an old, old custom by a humanity whose nature, in the mass, changes slowly.

And when it is all sifted down to its essence, you are getting a rather sincere compliment—the same compliment his jongleurs paid bold William the Conqueror, and his fellow-citizens paid Dick Whittington, who became lord mayor of London.

OLD CURE FOR COLDS

A library could be made of the various cures that have been recommended for colds. The old English cure, discovered more than 100 years ago by Dr. J. B. Williams, called the "dry cure," has lately been revived after decades of disuse. It consists simply in abstaining from all liquids for 48 hours or so, starting with the very first moment the cold declares itself.

Bread, fish, vegetables, "white" meat and pudding may be eaten, but no soup. If there is great thirst a spoonful of tea or coffee may be taken in the morning and a small glass of wine and water during the day. Some modern authorities consider this cure very efficient

BACKACHE IS KIDNEYACHE.

Usually There Are Other Troubles to Prove It.

Pain in the back is pain in the kidneys, in most cases, and it points to the need of a special remedy to remove and cure the congestion or inflammation of the kidneys that is interfering with their work and causing that pain that makes you say: "Oh, my back."

Thompson Watkins, professional nurse, 420 N. 23rd St., Parsons, Kan., says: "For some time I was annoyed with sharp twinges across the small of my back and irregular passages of the kidney secretions. Since using Doan's Kidney Pills, I am free from these troubles."

May Paste Million Posters.

Artists, billposters, printers, paper manufacturers and tuberculosis fighters are all united in a gigantic crusade against tuberculosis which is about to be started under the direction of the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis. In addition to the gifts of free space on billboards and free printing of posters made by the Associated Billposters and Distributors of America and the Poster Printers' Association, several hundred paper manufacturers have given paper for the posters to the value of several thousand dollars, and artists from all over the United States are contributing sketches for posters, free of charge. The local, state and national anti-tuberculosis associations will see that the posters are placed in cities and towns where they are most needed.

The posters are nine feet long and seven feet wide and will be printed in several colors. If sufficient paper is procured a million will be pasted up. The value of these various contributions would reach fully $2,000,000 if paid for at commercial rates.

In a London Omnibus.

A London 'bus driver was hailed by a clerical-looking old gentleman, and on the first opportunity he remarked to the conductor: "Do you know who you've got inside, Bill? It's Cardinal Mannin'!" "Go on, that ain't Cardinal Mannin'," said the conductor, "I know 'im." They argued further, and finally bet a shilling over it. When collecting fares the conductor determined to set matters right by direct inquiry. "Excuse me, sir, but are you Cardinal Mannin'?" The venerable passenger looked him coldly and boldly in the eye, and answered: "What the devil has that got to do with you?" The conductor was satisfied, but even at the sacrifice of a bob he had to get even with the passenger. Putting his head out of the door he called up to the driver: "You are right, Bill; it was 'is 'oliness."

An Ever Ready Opening.

The editor suddenly became conscious that some one was standing behind him. Looking round, his glance fell upon a seedy looking individual with the eyes of a crank.

"I beg your pardon," said the newcomer, "but is there an opening here for a first-class intellectual writer?"

"Yes," grimly responded the editor. "An ingenious carpenter, foreseeing your visit, has provided an excellent opening. Turn the knob to the right, and do not slam the door as you go out."—The Sunday Magazine.

There All the Time.

It is told of Dr. Thorold that he was once asked to give away the prizes at a school belonging to the London school board.

In the course of his opening address he gravely asked the children, "Which was the largest island in the world before Australia was discovered?"

When the youngsters gave it up, he said in the same grave way, which made them laugh all the more, "Why, Australia, of course; it was there all the time!"

RESULTS OF FOOD

Health and Natural Conditions Come From Right Feeding.

Man, physically, should be like a perfectly regulated machine, each part working easily in its appropriate place. A slight derangement causes undue friction and wear, and frequently ruins the entire system.

A well-known educator of Boston found a way to keep the brain and the body in that harmonious co-operation which makes a joy of living.

"Two years ago," she writes, "being in a condition of nervous exhaustion, I resigned my position as teacher, which I had held over 40 years. Since then the entire rest has, of course, been a benefit, but the use of Grape-Nuts has removed one great cause of illness in the past, namely, constipation, and its attendant evils.

"I generally make my entire breakfast on a raw egg beaten into four spoonfuls of Grape-Nuts, with a little hot milk or hot water added. I like it extremely, my food assimilates, and my bowels take care of themselves. I find my brain power and physical condition much greater and I know that the use of the Grape-Nuts has contributed largely to this result.

"It is with feelings of gratitude that I write this testimonial, and trust it may be the means of aiding others in their search for health."

Look in pkgs. for the little book, "The Road to Wellville." "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

BIG LUMBER OUTPUT

STATE FURNISHED ONE-THIRD OF COUNTRY'S WHITE PINE DURING 1909.

ONE OF THE "BIG FIVE" STATES

Wisconsin Is Second, With About 15 Per Cent.—Valuation of the Output Falls Behind That of Last Year.

Washington, D. C. — Washington, Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas and Wisconsin, in the order named, constitute the "big five" in producing the country's lumber supply, whose valuation for last year runs far above that of the billion dollar mark.

Texas, Michigan, Oregon, Minnesota and Pennsylvania rank after the first five states and others follow in decreasing amounts down to Utah, the lowest on the list, with Nevada and North Dakota, having little timbered area, not rated at all.

While the total valuation of the production of lumber, lath and shingle production reached $541,545,640, this is a decrease of 22 per cent under the previous year's output. The mills reporting manufactured 33,224,369,000 board feet of lumber, valued at $510,575,822, and 2,986,684,000 lath, valued at $6,791,328. Shingle makers turned out 12,106,483,000 shingles, valued at $24,178,490.

Yellow Pine From South.

The average value of lumber at the point of manufacture was $15.37 a thousand feet, $2.27 a thousand for lath and $2 a thousand for shingles.

Yellow pine of the south, which has been far in the lead in the lumber production for more than a decade, more than maintained its supremacy last year, contributing slightly more than 33 per cent of the total cut from all kinds. Douglas fir of the northwest ranked second and white pine third.

Oak and hemlock maintained their relative ranks, but showed decreases of 25 per cent each, and spruce dropped 18 per cent.

Louisiana was the heaviest producer of yellow pine lumber; Texas, Mississippi, Arkansas and Alabama followed. The state of Washington supplied more than three-fifths of the Douglas fir cut, while the bulk of the remainder came from Oregon.

Minnesota produced about a third of the white pine, followed by Wisconsin with about 15 per cent and New Hampshire third with 10 per cent.

Oak lumber now centers in Kentucky.

SIX STEERS SEEK HONORS.

Pride of Minnesota State Herds Sent To Chicago Show.

St. Paul.—Comfortably placed in a special car with a private attendant, six head of blooded steers went out from the Minnesota Agricultural college to go on exhibition at the International Live Stock show which opens in Chicago today. The animals are the pride of the University stock farm, and most of them already have records of prizes and places won at similar exhibitions. They are in charge of H. C. Campbell, who will see that they are properly fed and handled up to the minute they go on the platform.

Chief in the herd is Grand Champion Eclipser, an Angus three-year-old steer which stood second at the national show last year, and which is fully expected by his backers to take away the blue ribbon this time. Disclosure, a Hereford, goes in the same class of the Hereford breed, and is a Minnesota bred animal with winning points. Two Shorthorn yearlings, Juba and Prince Rollan, are to be entered in the younger class from Minnesota, with Undulata, an Angus yearling who stood first in his class last year. Barbarian, another Angus calf closes the list. He is expected to be a winner in the youngest class at the show.

Prof. Haeker, head of the livestock department, went to Chicago yesterday, and will take charge of the Student's judging contest, which is the first event on the show program. Prof. Boss and Instructor Gaumnitz leave today and expect to study the best stock in the world.

M'GOVERN IS ON ALL-AMERICAN.

Washington, D. C.—Johnny McGovern, the Minnesota quarterback, is given a place on the All-American football team selected by the Washington Herald. The Herald says of McGovern:

"Howe of Yale, O'Flaherty of Harvard and Bergin of Princeton are only of mediocre caliber. Sprackling of Brown is a good man, and Vooris of Pennsylvania State has also shown marked skill in handling his team, but from several who knew football and have seen McGovern play, it is stated that the Minnesota quarter has something on all the Eastern lads."

GOPHER BANQUET IN CHICAGO.

Minnesota Society Will Hold Second Annual Dinner Thursday.

Chicago, Illinois.—The second annual banquet of the Minnesota Society of Chicago will be given Thursday evening in the Grand Pacific hotel, Chicago. Addresses will be made by prominent men of the state and a musical program has been arranged, with the Irish Choral society, Chicago, taking part.

N. Y. GOPHERS TO BANQUET.

Real Stars Will Be Set On Roof of Waldorf-Astoria.

New York, N. Y. —.The annual dinner of the Minnesota society of New York will be held on the evening of Dec. 18 at the Waldorf-Astoria. Already the sun parlor has been reserved for the occasion, but should the number of those who signify their intention of being present exceed 100, the main banquet hall of the hotel will be used. The sun parlor is on the roof of the great hostelry. It is a large glass room and should the annual banquet of the society be spread in it, the diners will feast under the stars of heaven, with the glimmering lights of the city in full view below them.

Timothy E. Byrnes, fourth vice president of the New York, New Haven and Hartford railroad, is the president of the society this year and he is making a strenuous effort to secure a record-breaking attendance at the dinner. He has sworn that he will fetch Senator Knute Nelson from Washington and he has announced that already Representative Tawney of Winona has signified his intention of accepting an invitation to the dinner.

Three railway presidents at least will be among the diners on the 18th of next month. They are President Mellen of the New York, New Haven and Hartford railroad; President Underwood of the Erie and President Winter of the Brooklyn Rapid Transit. It is expected, too, that James J. Hill, chairman of the board of the Great Northern railroad, will also be present.

Among the speakers will be such well known orators as ex-Senator Charles A. Towne, Rev. John Wesley Hill of the Metropolitan Temple, formerly pastor of Fowler Methodist Episcopal church of Minneapolis; Dr. David James Burrell of the Marble Collegiate church, formerly pastor of Westminster Presbyterian church of Minneapolis, and Dr. Albert Shaw, editor of the Review of Reviews, formerly of The Minneapolis Tribune.

The Minnesota society is made up of men who are now in the forefront of the financial, railroad and professional world in this city, and consequently of the country, and its annual banquet always attracts widespread attention.

The date this year has been set with a view to accommodating residents of Minnesota who may happen to be in New York the week before Christmas to do their holiday shopping and all those who are now intending to visit the metropolis during that week are invited to communicate with the treasurer of the society, W. R. Richards, so that invitations may be sent them.

The officers of the society are Timothy E. Byrnes, president; Henry G. Ingersoll, secretary; W. B. Richards of 43 Wall Street, treasurer, and John Henry Hammond, F. W. M. Cutcheon, Cando Hamlin and A. B. Stickney, vice presidents.

BEMIDJI MARSHAL IS SHOT.

Was Attempting to Arrest Highwayman.

Bemidji.—An unknown highwayman was killed and Deputy Sheriff Andrew Johnson, of this city, dangerously wounded in a desperate battle 17 miles from this city.

Two highwaymen entered the store owned by B. Laqua, at Puposky, a town 17 miles northwest of here, at 2:30 in the morning and attempted to blow the safe. The noise awoke Mr. Laqua, the proprietor, who grabbed a shotgun and fired two shots at the robbers. They exchanged the shots but none took effect. The robbers then ran and stole a speeder from the Red Lake railway company and escaped in the direction of Bemidji. Mr. Laqua notified Deputy Johnson of this city and he, in company with Allan Benner, hurried to the overhead bridge, one mile outside of the city limits and waited for the men to appear.

They had not long to wait for in five minutes the two highwaymen appeared. Johnson ordered the men to hold up their hands, but in response to this was shot at by one of them. The shot entered his left shoulder, passed through his lung and came out of his left side. Brenner then fired at the robbers, hitting and instantly killing one.

The dead robber is believed to be a lumberjack known here as Jim Smith who has been working in this vicinity for the past three years. He was shot in the head, death being instantaneous. The other robber escaped but posses are scouring the woods for him. He has been traced to the Wilton camp three miles from Bemidji and his caputure is expected soon.

"TRUST BUSTER" GOES EAST.

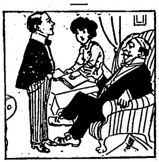
Frank B. Kellogg Follows Standard Oil Case to Capital.

St. Paul.—Frank B. Kellogg, attorney for the government in the recent Standard Oil prosecution, has gone to Washington to confer with the attorney general and with the president relative to the famous Standard Oil case.

Norwegians at Barnesville.

Barnesville.—The city of Barnesville city witnessed one of the largest Norwegian gatherings ever held in this part of the state, it being the meeting place of the Young People's Association of the Norwegian church. Fully 400 delegates were here. Prominent speakers of the day were: Prof. O E. Brandt, St. Paul; Revs. Ylisaker and Ristad, Fergus Falls; Jacobson, Fargo; Seusmnen, Detroit; and N. B. Hanson, Barnesville A concert was held in the evening and was the big event of the meeting.

THE DIFFERENCE.



"As there has been a change in our fortunes, Maudie, make haste and find a husband. You, Jack, don't make a fool of yourself by marrying."

SKIN ROUGH AS BARK.

Baby Boy Had Intense Itching Humor —Scratched Till Blood Ran.

Found a Cure in Cuticura.

"Our son, two years old, was afflicted with a rash. After he suffered with the trouble several weeks I took him to the doctor but it got worse. The rash ran together and made large blisters. The little fellow didn't want to do anything but scratch and we had to wrap his hands up to keep him from tearing the flesh open till the blood would run. The itching was intense. The skin on his back became hard and rough like the bark of a tree. He suffered intensely for about three months. But I found a remedy in Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment. The result was almost magical. That was more than two years ago and there has not been the slightest symptom of it since he was cured. J. W. Lauck, Yukon, Okla., Aug. 28 and Sept. 17, 1908."

All the Same to Her.

"I must warn you, dearest," he said, "that after we are married you will very likely find me inclined to be arbitrary and dictatorial in my manner."

"No matter," she replied, cheerfully, "I won't pay the slightest attention to what you say."

The More Glorious Alternative.

Maud Muller knew what she wanted, "I'd rather be written up in a poem that the funny men will be parodying a hundred years from now than marry the judge to-morrow!" she exclaimed, and suiting the action to the word, she raked the meadow sweet with hay in such a manner that the judge riding slowly down the lane, smoothed his horse's chestnut mane, and let it go at that.

Naturally the girl's folks were considerably disgusted at having her left on their hands that way, but who ever purchased a worthy immortality cheaply?—Puck.

Outwit the Horse Sharper

Did you ever find a lemon in a horse's nose? How and why did it get there? Did the last horse you bought go incurably lame the next day? Do you know why? Why were his ears tied together with a fine silken thread? Perhaps you are about to buy a horse because you like his "ginger"? Are you sure it is health and high spirits, or IS it ginger—commercial ginger? Are you sure you could tell the age of a horse by its teeth? Or would your experience be like that other man's, who paid $3500 for a 17-year-old horse, thinking he was buying a 7-year-old? The horse had been "Bishoped."

Horse buying and trading offer hundreds of opportunities and temptations to use trickery and sharp practice. There is only one way to meet it:—read

Doped and Doctored horses are sold every day; be on your guard.

A Partial List of Secrets

SECRETS OF HORSE TRADING AND SELLING:

"HORSE SECRETS" EXPOSED

It will protect you—will make you horse-wise and crook-proof, and save you from being cheated by dopes or tricks when buying, selling, or trading. It exposes and makes you acquainted with the tricks and handling methods of gyps and a certain class of unscrupulous dealers. Many of the secrets of this book are now made public for the first time. No such collection of Horse Trading, Horse Buying, Horse Training, and Horse Feeding information has ever before been published. It is impossible even in this large space to give a complete list of the secrets in this sensational book.

"Horse Secrets" has been prepared by Dr. A. S. Alexander, the famous veterinarian, who has had upwards of 25 years' experience in Horse-Buying and Breeding.

How to Secure "Horse Secrets"

Horse Secrets has all the interest of an exciting story. The reader goes along from page to page with increasing wonderment at the clever dishonesty of tricky horse traders. It is a book that will sharpen your wits, and already the demand has far exceeded our expectations. We could sell this book and make large sales, too, at almost any price we wanted to ask. But we believe that WE CAN DO MORE GOOD in another way; therefore we offer it only in connection with the following offer:

Horse Secrets and subscription to FARM JOURNAL for 5 years, both for $1.00

FARM JOURNAL is the paper taken by most farmers, and by at least 150,000 people in towns and villages all over the United States. 650,000 cash-in-advance subscribers read every issue with delight and profit. It is a farm paper for farmers, but it is far more than that. Splendid departments on Vegetables, Flowers, Poultry, Household Hints and Recipes, Fashions, High Grade Patterns, the Family Doctor, Legal Questions, Boys' and Girls' pages, etc., as well as on Horses, Cows, Sheep, Swine, Orchard, and Field Crops.

In short, it is for everybody, town as well as country, and at the same time practical, instructive, amusing, and cheerful.

FARM JOURNAL is clean and pure. It never has to be carried out of the house with the tongs. The advertising columns receive the most careful scrutiny and the bars are up all the time against medical, deceptive, suggestive or nasty advertising of any kind whatever.

FARM JOURNAL is thirty-three years old, and has grown to be by far the largest in the world. Its score of editors are men and women who write "with their sleeves rolled up." They know what they are talking about, and can quit when they are through.

By itself, FARM JOURNAL is worth many dollars a year to every American who lives in or near the country. Yet the price, WITH "Horse Secrets" is only $1.00 for FIVE YEARS.

Legends of the Boy Christ

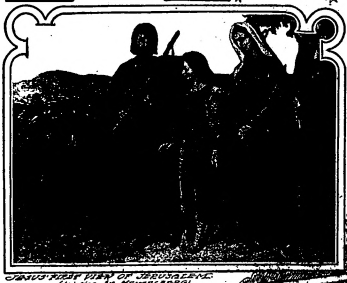
ONE bright, sunny morning in the month of Adar, at the end of winter, shortly after the little town of Nazareth, in Judea, was astir, there trooped from the village a crowd of merry children, laughing for sheer happiness, as if their hearts sang with the song of dancing sunbeams.

Running and skipping along the road they went, blithe and gay, until they came to a great tree by the roadside, where they stopped, and clustering about a child in their midst, proceeded to do a strange thing.

They cast their mantles and tunics from them to the ground and prostrated themselves before the one in their midst; then left him, and, running into a field, gathered flowers. He that sat alone, a pensive look upon his youthful face, had the appearance of an angel.

Soon the little playmates, their arms laden with blossoms, returned, and weaving a wreath of glory flowers, crowned his head.

Into his hands they placed a scepter of burning gladiolus. And about him they joyously scattered the fresh, odorous blooms, and while he smiled upon them they proclaimed the little playmate, Jesus, the son of the village carpenter, their king.



JESUS' FIRST VIEW OF JERUSALEM.
(painting by HENGELBERG)

While they delighted in their worship of their little playmate, along the road in the distance could be seen two men coming, with heads sorrowfully bent, carrying between them the dead body of a boy.

"What has happened?" the children cried.

"Alas!" responded one of the men, the child was playing in the forests yonder and methinks, like many boys, robbed the nests of some little birds.

"Presently, climbing a tree, he did put his hand into the nest, and lo! there was hidden a poisonous serpent, that sank its fangs into his flesh. He suffered terrible agony and, sliding from the tree, lay until he died. There we found him."

"Come," the boys said, "and tell our king."

Before the crowned one they paused and told the story.

Rising, he said: "follow me."

Silently they wended their way back to the woods. "Lead us to the tree," said the child king. And there he paused.

"Oh, treacherous serpent, I command thee to come down," he called. And lo! above the nest appeared a venomous head, and soon the long, glistening body of a deadly snake came writhing down the trunk.

"Go, suck from that child's hand all the poison thou didst place therein from thy fangs."

CHRIST IN THE TEMPLE WITH THE DOCTORS.
(painting by HOFMANN)

To the amazement of the beholders, who sank on their knees, the serpent obeyed. Then, drawing away, it writhed in the agony of its own poison and shiveled to death.

"Arise," said the child, laying his soft hand on the face of the one who seemed dead.

A moment passed. Those nearby looked on breathlessly. Then the face of the dead boy broke into a smile, as though he were having pleasant dreams, and he opened his eyes.

It is related in the Arabic Gospel of the Infancy that afterward the boy, Simon Zelotes, became one of the disciples of Jesus.

Of the days and doings of the boy Jesus in Nazareth the four gospels tell us comparatively little. It was natural, therefore, that about this unknown existence of the Adorable Child the Christians of the early church deeply pondered and that the rich imaginations of medieval times should have woven a vesture of traditionary lore.

The holy family returned from Egypt when Jesus was old enough to walk. In many of the old pictures we see the Divine Child leading a mule or clinging close to his mother. Of that early life in the land of the Pyramids, too, early tradition has woven a pleasing fabric of legends.

Among the oldest of these is the ancient belief that whenever the blessed Mary placed the clothing of the holy babe upon trees to dry the barren limbs burst into bloom.

Another is that when the child wandered into the forest, where lions and panthers and all manner of wild beasts lived, they came forth to do him homage.

Still another, that, during the flight from Bethlehem, when Herod pursued them, mountains opened to receive Joseph and Mary and the holy babe into a secure refuge; that on hot days, as they reposed under trees, the boughs bent over to shield them from the sun, and that as they passed along flowers sprang up in their pathway from the arid sand, and that the barren desert bloomed where they passed it.

It is told that when they journeyed through a forest all the trees bowed low in worship of the Holy One that passed by, and that only one tree—the aspen—held aloof, proud and scornful. It is also related that the babe gazed upon the tree and that, overcome with terror, it began to tremble, and has trembled ever since.

> Only the aspen stood erect and free,
> Scorning to join the voiceless worship pure;
> But see, he cast one look upon the tree,
> Struck to the heart, she trembled evermore.

It is also told that when the holy family came in sight of the sphinx the great beast told the eternal secret, and as they passed the temples the old gods fell from their thrones.

> And, coming nigh to On,
> Where stands the house of Ra, its mighty god,
> Cut in black porphyry, prodigious, feared,
> Fell from his seat.

Some writers of old say that the holy child never went to school. They love to write of his wandering alone into the forests and talking to the birds and insects. And they tell how dumb beasts were endowed with speech when he was with them.

Many old legends concern the early schooling of the boy Christ. It is related that when a child he was taken to Zaccheus, who began to try to teach him the alphabet.

"My teacher," the marvelous boy is said to have uttered, "thou wouldst teach me, but I shall teach thee."

And then, while the old man listened, thunderstruck, he repeated an alphabet which the other had never learned. He told Zaccheus he had lived from all time and knew all things. Zaccheus, amazed, declared he could teach the child nothing.

Some of the legends, as unworthy as the minds that created them, tell that the child struck his teacher dead. Others tell of his inflicting playmates with death and blindness. In the world of legendary lore, where one finds stories ingenuously simple and charming, it is to be expected, also, that there are crude and cruel traditions.

According to some stories, the children of Nazareth must have found Jesus a wonderful playmate. There was hardly any wish of theirs which he did not fulfill. One day, it is told, some of the little ones wished for fruit.

"Oh, how I would like an apple!" said one.

"And I some figs!" rejoined another.

"How I would love some citron and grapes!" quoth a third.

Jesus looked upon them and they all seemed so hungry and so anxious that he made a sign in the air and spoke a mystic word. And lo!

A green sprout curled from the ground. Pale green leaves burst forth. The plant rose up and up and up.

"Oh!" gasped all the children with great wonder, as before their gaze the plant rose, higher and higher, spreading out limbs—growing larger and stronger, and blooming with flowers. Then the tree, as they looked, bore fruit—apples and citrons, and grapes and figs and whatever their hearts wished.

Here is another story of those childhood days:

A house was being built near the small and modest home of the holy family. One day a great uproar arose and Joseph, stepping from his carpenter shop, saw that a man had wallen from the roof and had been killed.

"Alas! Mary," he said, entering the shop, where Jesus was playing, "a man has fallen and broken his limbs; methinks he is dead."

Springing from the floor, the child, with an expression of great solicitude on his face, rushed into the street. The little crowd parted before him.

He peered into the white face of the dead man. Then his voice rang clear and sweet:

"I say unto thee, arise and do thy work."

The dead man's eyes opened, the blood disappeared from his face and his injuries healed. And he arose and went back to his task.

At another time Jesus was playing with some children on a roof—one of those simple, childish games like that of "tag" to-day. The children were very happy until one, falling at full length, went tumbling over the parapet. A cry arose. Peering over the stone wall, the face of Jesus turned white—his little playmate was dead.

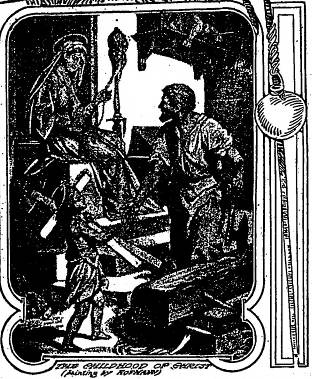
Imagine his distress when the parents of the child appeared and accused Jesus of having pushed the little playmate over the wall! Imagine the anguish of Joseph and Mary at the grave accusation! Then Jesus, turning to the dead child, called:

"Zeno! Zeno! Arise! Arise, Zeno, and tell them if I cast thee down."

And Zeno arose, laughing, clasping and kissing the hand of Jesus, murmuring tenderly, gratefully:

"No, no! Thou didst not cast me down."

Until his manhood, when he began his mission, it is believed he plied the trade of carpenter. Many, indeed, are the stories of his life in the carpenter shop of Nazareth



THE CHILDHOOD OF CHRIST
(painting by HOFMANN)

Many are the tales they tell of the wonderful things he made when he was but a little boy. Precocious he must have been, and early he became indispensable to his foster father, Joseph.

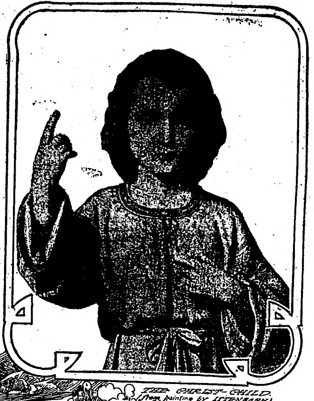
Joseph, we learn, from these legends, was none too good a carpenter—that is, judged by the modern standards of carpentering. Often he would cut pieces of wood that were too long or too short, for his means of measurement were faulty. What, then, did Jesus do but take the wood and stretch it or shorten it to the desired length.

> People told
> Strange tales of those hid days—now, at his toil,
> Touching a plank, it stretched to rightful length,
> Or shortened at his will—the dead wood quick
> To live again and serve him.

In those days, it is related, Joseph was awarded a commission to make a throne for a king at Jerusalem. It was to be an elaborate affair, as all thrones are, with great arms and twisted legs and grotesque carvings—one of those things only kings like to sit in.

Jesus spent much time watching Joseph hewing and carving the wood. Joseph worked patiently from morning until night and the work required two whole years. And then, imagine the poor carpenter's disappointment when it was taken to Jerusalem and he discovered that it was too small for its place.

Alas! he had made a grave error. Yes, they had given him the right dimensions, but, as it often happened, and carpenters do still, he made the mistake. Two entire years of labor wasted! The poor man was disconsolate.



THE CHRIST-CHILD.
(From painting by ITTENBACH)

"But why weepest thou?" asked Jesus, who was with him. "This is readily amended. Be at peace."

Then he directed Joseph to hold one end of the throne, while he took hold of the other. Both pulled, and behold! the throne assumed the proper size.

One Sabbath morning, with a half-dozen playmates, the child Jesus, one old legend runs, went to play by the banks of the River Jordan. There had been a heavy rain the night before, and the tall trees were still dripping and the sand was wet.

Sitting on the sand, the little ones began to fashion, childrenwise, animals of various kinds. Jesus, fashioning dogs and cats and all manner of wild things, raised his hand and spoke—and, lo, the animals of sand lived and moved.

The children shouted. Their laughter of delight rang through the fresh morning air. Some of the animals ran away, others were changed into sand again.

Then digging his small hands into the sand, the child said:

"I'll make 12 sparrows."

And he sat them in a row before him.

By this time several Pharisees, who had seen the children playing happily on the Sabbath, returned with Joseph, whom they said should censure Jesus.

"Thou are breaking the Sabbath my child," said the old man.

The child pondered, looked at the birds of his creation, then rising, he > Clapped His hands and lo!

> They chirruped, spread their wings > and flew away.

In these old legends there is a great deal of the fanciful, the legend of the boy and the animals of sand shows the quaint conceits of the early Christians, who delighted in miracles and whose imagination was excited by this unknown period of the Saviour's life.

One can well imagine him as a child wandering away from Nazareth, all alone, and sitting by the Jordan or forest streams and communing of the great things that came to him.

He could not have been like other children, for he was wise beyond his years. One can see him, as fair as the lilies and roses themselves, caressing the flowers as he passed by in the meadows of Judea, and of his sitting crowned in an aureole of sunbeams, listening to the divine rapture of the birds singing their morning hymns.

He must often have been alone for with the petty quarrels of the other children of the town, with the little rivalries of his relatives, he could have had little sympathy. Doubtless as a child, his poet's soul soared into the skies, and his seer's vision saw the future in the cumulus clouds. All great souls live alone, and are lonely in the midst of men. About a beautiful life humanity loves to build legends, and the simple life which leads to spiritual greatness must to men be made unusual with a halo of miracles.

Many stories are told of the child Jesus having raised people from the dead in the little known days of his childhood. It is related, too, that when his parents took him to Jerusalem—on the same journey when he had the famous discussion with the learned doctors in the temple—he paused at the sight of Jerusalem, and a spirit of prophecy revealed to him its doom.

Prophetic Beethoven.

Has anyone remarked on the startling resemblance to the sharp toot of a motor horn of those four-times repeated double notes in Beethoven's "Second Symphony," which demonstrates how a great imaginative genius may be far ahead of his contemporaries? The classic example is Shakespeare and the telegraph. When these familiar notes are heard in the symphony the audience may be seen to look anxiously over the shoulder and prepare to cut and run.—London Chronicle.

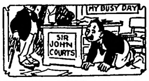
Pester House Clerk About Ancestors



WASHINGTON.—Sir John Courts, Bart, K. C. M. G., K. O. C., C. B., who, as plain James C. Courts serves the United States government in the responsible position of clerk of the House committee on appropriations, has his troubles just like other folks. People are all the time pestering him to death to know if it was his grandfather or his great-grandfather or his great-great-grandfather who used to own about 20,000 acres in Maryand and who presided over the feudal glories of Clean Drinking Manor. And every time he gets through with one of these historic bugs and settles down to work a delegation of home folks from Tennessee drops in on him and demands to know why he accepted from the Emperor of Korea—before that eminent personage was sat upon by the Japanese—the military order of the Setting Moon, third class and wears the undress button that goes with it all the time.

But even these annoying things pale into insignificance beside an incident that happened just the other day. Mr. Courts has his nose in a chaotic appropriation bill and was dictating to four adding machines all at once when a straight-backed, straight-nosed, white-mustached, white-haired and extremely dignified old gentleman marched into the committee room. He was looking for his member and as the member wasn't on hand, had turned around to go out again, when he caught sight of Mr. Courts.

There was a moment of tenseness and of pause—a hiatus in other words. And then the old gentleman advanced and cast himself—a perfertly dignified cast—on Mr. Courts' bosom, clutched Mr. Courts' hand, patted Mr. Courts' shoulder and gazed into Mr. Courts' eyes. And as a dozen or so members of the appropriations committee gathered around the old gentleman exploded his bomb.

"Captain," he said to Mr. Courts. "I am moah than happy to meet you again. I consider this the happiest day of my life, my dear comrade in arms. Well I remember the days when, side by side, knee to knee, we followed the fortunes of that flower of chivalry, that most dashing of cavalry leaders, our idolized chieftain, Gen. J. E. B. Stuart."

Of course it was a case of mistaken identity.

Old General Got No Aid from His Aide

GEN. Luke E. Wright, told at a dinner in Washington a war story from Manila.

"There was once upon a time," he began, "a gallant old general. This general, leading a splendid charge in his youth, got a bullet in his chest and two sabre cuts across the head. In after life, relating over the nuts and wine his many battles, it was this particular charge that he always described most flamboyantly.

"The older the general grew the more splendid the charge became; the more awful was the slaughter that he visited upon the enemy; the more horrible were the wounds that he received. For corroboration he would always turn to a grizzled veteran on his left, his aide-de-camp. The aide-de-camp would nod his gray head in acquiescence silently.

"Taller and taller grew the general's stories of the charge. Higher and higher grew the mound of enemies slain by his sword. More and more numerous became the bullets, thrusts and slashes sustained by himself. At the end he always appealed to the grizzled aid; and in silence the aid nodded confirmation.

"The general one night gave a large dinner party. The wine was no less abundant than superb, and at dessert the old warrior let himself out upon the charge as he had never heretofore done. Four horses were killed under him. Three lances passed through his right arm, five through his left, Nine sabres crashed down upon his head simultaneously. The bodies of his slain formed a wall wellnigh impassable about him. And it seemed that there was hardly a muscle in his person wherein a bullet failed to imbed itself.

"'You remember all this, don't you, De Courcey?' he said, in conclusion.

"The silent and long suffering aid at last spoke up.

"'No, general,' he shouted, in a loud, indignant voice. 'No, of course I don't remember it. How can you expect me to? You know as well as I do that the cannon ball that killed your fourth horse struck the breastplate of a cuirassier behind us and then bounded back and took my head off!'"

Plans Homegoing of Irishmen in 1910

THE OLD SOD
U.S.

FIFTEEN years ago Francis J. Kilkenny arrived in this country from Ireland. He was so green that he mistook a Fourth of July celebration as a reception to himself. Young Kilkenny had relatives and friends in Milwaukee and Chicago and he made for the middle west soon after his landing. He had a fund of native wit and an abundance of energy and pluck. He got a job cutting grass and soon came under the notice of Charles G. Dawes. When Mr. Dawes came to Washington as controller of the currency he brought Kilkenny along as his private secretary. When Dawes retired from the controllership his successor found he couldn't get along without Kilkenny. Mr. Ridgely was succeeded as controller by Lawrence O. Murray and that official has retained Kilkenny who has now become one of the institutions of the treasury department.

Young Kilkenny is making remarkable headway with a movement for the "home-going" of Irishmen in 1910. The plan is to induce the Irish people from all over the United States to return to their native land during July, August and September.

Chautauqua Salute, Menace to Health

DR. WILLIAM C. WOODWARD, health officer of the District of Columbia, is in favor of abolishing the only form of athletics indulged in by members and graduates of the Chautauqua literature and reading circle. He says that the Chautauqua salute is a menace to health.

The salute, as all Chautauquans know, is a waving of the handkerchief when friends make a hit on the lecture platform or sail away for distant lands. Everybody waves and everybody is happy provided that one does not overtax his or her energy.

"The custom of waving a handkerchief vigorously in the air," says Dr. Woodward, "is dangerous. Nearly every contagious disease can be communicated in this manner, if the handkerchief is slightly soiled. If the linen square has just been purchased, or has come straight from the laundry, there is not the slightest danger, but the waving of a handkerchief that has been used even once is harmful.

"When a handkerchief is waved the wind blows the germs from it. Typhoid fever, scarlet fever, tuberculosis, smallpox and chickenpox, measles, leprosy and diphtheria may be thus spread."

The Chautauqua saluters criticised the health officer's remarks.

"Dr. Woodward does not know what he is talking about," said a young woman. "We never carry soiled handkerchiefs."

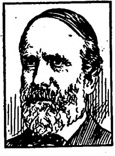
IN THE PUBLIC EYE

IS OLDEST ARMY OFFICER



Brigadier-General Daniel H. Rucker, retired, is not only the oldest officer of the United States army now living, but also the oldest man that has ever been in the military service of this country.

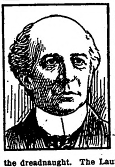
The lapse of time since his birth is most vividly realized when it is considered that General Rucker has lived in every presidential administration since the government began, save only three—those of Washington, Adams and Jefferson. He was born only 13 years after the death of the first president and among his friends and acquaintances have been a good many people who knew George Washington.

But anybody who saw the general to-day would never imagine that these things could be true. He is quite as spry and youthful in his ways as many a man of 65. In Washington, where he lives, he walks downtown nearly every morning and is often seen on the streetcars. Only the other day he was noticed standing on the running board of an open car, having got up and stepped out to allow some ladies to pass.

General Rucker was 97 years of age on April 28 last. But it does not seem to him that this fact gave any excuse for the remarkable zealousness of a certain life insurance company which, a few weeks ago, sent a man to his house on Jefferson place to make a money settlement for his death. Greatly irritated by this summary notice of his own demise, he walked downtown the next morning and dropped in at the office of the company.

The company was very apologetic. Yes, it was obliged to admit the general had the appearance of being alive. His presence in the office was evidence in favor of such a supposition. But in a technical sense he was dead. From a life insurance viewpoint he had passed over to the beyond.

CANADA FOR INDEPENDENCE



Some optimistic persons in Canada believe the day is not far distant when the Dominion will become a republic independent of England. In such an event, they believe, Sir Wilfrid Laurier would become the head of the new nation.

When the imperial council of defense sent out from London recommendations that included the construction, manning and operation of a Canadian war navy protests arose from all parts of the Dominion. The actual government measure presented by Sir Wilfrid to the house of commons has caused another outburst, which indicates clearly that many Canadians look forward to ultimate independence.

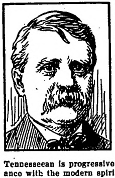
The defense council suggested that Canada build one Dreadnaught, three cruisers, six destroyers and three submarines, beginning with the dreadnaught. The Laurier bill calls for three cruisers and four destroyers, which will cost $8,000,000 to build and $1,500,000 a year to maintain.

Sir Wilfrid stated on the floor of the house that the Canadian fleet would not be under orders from London and would not even participate in naval warfare as a British ally, unless specifically ordered to do so by the Canadian parliament.

"If we have no voice in making peace or war," says the Montreal Herald, "how can we with safety abandon the right to follow what course we please? Unquestionably, being who we are, our fleet will almost under any conceivable circumstances co-operate with the British navy when war ensues. But the power of volition in a matter of such moment must be retained."

The Ottawa Citizen states its case thus: "Should the day come when the country that was the cradle of liberty proves recreant to its traditions, then Canada will disown that country and change its flag instanter."

GOES TO THE SUPREME COURT



President Taft has selectetd Judge Horace Harmon Lurton to fill the vacancy in the United States supreme court caused by the death of Associate Justice Rufus W. Peckham.

Judge Lurton has been a judge of the sixth judicial circuit of the United States circuit court of appeals, the district including Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio and Michigan.

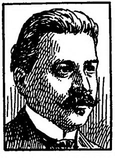
Judge Lurton, a prominent Tennessee Democrat, even though he has never held elective office, is an ex-confederate soldier and in Michigan is known as the man who once decided a street car case against the late Governor Pingree.

Mr. Taft's service on the circuit bench with Judge Lurton convinced him of the integrity and rectitude of that jurist. His later contact with him has demonstrated to his satisfaction that the Tennesseean is progressive in thought and will interpret the laws in accordance with the modern spirit.

The judge was born in Campbell county, Ky., February 26, 1844, his father, at that time a physician, later becoming an Episcopalian minister.

His education at the University of Chicago cut short by the civil war, young Lurton hurried south and enlisted as sergeant-major in the Thirty-fifth Tennessee. In February, 1862, he was discharged for sickness. He returned to the front, however, in time to take part in the battle of Fort Donelson.

HE'LL BE THE CAFE KING



Henri Pruger, for the last seven years general manager of the Hotel Savoy, London, has been engaged as general manager of the new Cafe de l'Opera in New York City at a salary of $50,000. This, it is believed, is the largest salary paid to any restaurant manager in the world. Mr. Pruger is president of the company that will operate the restaurant, which has just been opened. It occupies an entire building on the west side of Broadway, between Forty-second and Forty-first streets.

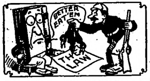
In London Mr. Pruger has become known to thousands of Americans. Before going to the Savoy he conducted the Grand Hotel Nationale, Leizone, and a chain of hotels in southern Europe, including the Grand Hotel at Monte Carlo and the Grand Hotel at Rome.

"I realize keenly," said Mr. Pruger, "that my work in New York will be enough to keep any man thoroughly alive. American hotels and restaurants are in many respects the finest in the world. There are hotels and restaurants in this city which have no superiors anywhere. In the new Cafe de l'Opera it is our desire to add still another brilliant establishment to the list of those of which New York is so proud. Two of the best chefs in Europe have been brought to New York to see that the culinary part of the restaurant begins operations as it should.

"In furnishings and decorations we have a restaurant unique. I feel that my life's work lies in New York, and although I was sorry to leave my old friends in London I welcome the opportunity of working in America in a restaurant so beautiful as the Cafe de l'Opera."

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Chicago Has No Cash for Crow Hunter



CHICAGO. — The following bill against the County of Cook theratens to share the sad fate of the claim of one of Mark Twain's heroes for a barrel of beef captured and eaten by the Indians while his grandfather was trying to deliver it to one of the army posts on the plains:

To killing four crows at 10c	$ .40
To destroying 73 crows' eggs at 5c	3.65
Total	$4.05

The present claimant against Cook county is Bernard Swensen, who lives in the township of Orland in the remote southwestern corner of the county. Somewhere in the mazes of the statute books of the state is a law which provides for a bounty on crows at the prices named in Swensen's claim. It also provided that the heads of the crows and the eggs shall be turned over to the town clerk for destruction; also that he shall make a certificate to the effect that such destruction has taken place; and, further, that upon presentation of such facts to the county clerk the latter shall provide the necessary credentials upon the county treasurer for the payment of the bounty.

Proceeding along these lines, Swensen appeared before Town Clerk B. F. Sippel, who, having convinced himself that the claim was proper, proceeded with due solemnity to the stipulated work of destruction by burning the heads of the crows and smashing the eggs. Then he made affidavit to the whole transaction, furnishing names, dates and details, and affixed to the document the great seal of the Township of Orland.

Thus fortified, the claimant boarded a Wabash train and in time appeared at the office of the county clerk, where with becoming modesty he presented his credentials.

The chief deputy got into communication with President Busse and was informed that the claim was perfectly legal, but that there was no appropriation out of which to pay for the killing of crows,

O'Leary Defends Noted Chicago Cow

CHICAGO.—"The real cause of the Chicago fire has never been told in print. It was not started by my mother's cow kicking over a lamp. The origin of the blaze was spontaneous combustion of 'green' hay. Put that in the paper as coming from me, and I'll give odds of 1,000 to 1 that I can prove it."

"Big Jim" O'Leary, the stockyards saloonkeeper and "gambling king," made the foregoing statement recently. It was in reply to a statement made by Rev. John D. Leek in a sermon in Whitney opera house that the O'Leary cow kicked over a lamp in resentment at three boys who were milking the animal.

"I don't care what anybody else says about the fire," said O'Leary, thrusting his thumbs in the ormholes of his vest. "My parents are dead and can't defend themselves against this latest fake as to the origin of the fire, but I'll speak out.

"That story about the cow kicking over the lamp was the monumental fake of the last century. I know what I'm talking about when I say that the fire was caused by spontaneous combustion in the hayloft.

"You see, it was like this: The old man had put in a load of 'green' hay a few days before the fire. Below the hay loft were the stables where the cows were kept. We had several cows and did quite a milk business.

"It was Sunday night that the big fire started. On that night we had all gone to bed half an hour before the fire broke out. I hadn't gone to sleep yet and was the first one of the family to hear the firemen shouting in front of the house.

"Both my father and mother went to their graves sad at heart over the world wide notoriety given them in the printed accounts of the burning of Chicago. I wish to make it as emphatic as possible that the O'Leary cow did not kick over a lamp."

"Foxy Grandpa," in Mask, Causes Scare

DETROIT, Mich.—Louis Voss is somewhat of a cut-up. He is one of those indulgent fathers who likes to play jokes on the boys. Beside him, old man Peck and Foxy Grandpa are weak performers.

It started because the little Vosses were careless enough to leave a lot of Hallow'en masks lying around the house. Charley Voss, one of the most precocious of the younger Voss contingent, was entertaining Max Dollee in the barn back of the Voss home at 1261 Monroe avenue.

Charley and Max were punching the bag. Charley excused himself for a few minutes and left the future Jim Jeffries banging away at the inflated leather. About this time the elder Voss happened upon the masks.

So he disguised himself as a dervish, or some other person equally devlish. Then he made tracks for the barn. If Max ever had any aspirations in the direction of prize-fight honors, he forgot them when his affrighted eyes confronted the face infernal. Max passed Voss and went down the barn stairs in just one jump. At the same instant he yelled for Dave Harris, this being the name of a near relative who dwells in the vicinity.

Dave heard the cry of distress and he and Mrs. Harris, with all the little Harrises, piled out into the night. Dave hit upon Voss, Sr., first.

It was no time for explanations and Voss had no chance to offer one. Dave grappled with him. The two swayed back and forth in the alley. Dave's wife caught one glimpse of Voss's false face in the moonlight, concluded that her husband was struggling with a fiend, and fainted.

The uproar brought all the neighbors out and it was some minutes before affairs could be adjusted.

Dogs Eat at Tables with Banqueters

NEW YORK.—An old-fashioned English hunt dinner—with hounds occupying seats at the table—marked the ending in Smithtown of one of the largest drag hunts ever held on Long island.

Those who partook of the feast, which was given in the Head River inn, represented every hunt club of social prominence in and around New York and from as great a distance as Philadelphia.

Among the guests were noted riders in the Rockaway, Westchester, Meadowbrook, Smithtown and Staten Island clubs. Many Quaker City hunters were present.

The bill of fare was gamy from start to finish, but the most characteristic of all were the costumes of the diners. The women were in evening dress. Many of them had brought with them their full array of diamonds and pearls for the occasion.

The men were in hunting costume, and their scarlet or green coats and "weskits," corduroy or other full-length leggings and high-topped boots gave to the scene a touch of realism not often witnessed outside of the swell country places in Great Britain.

As for the hounds, they were treated in the old-time hunt dinner way as if they not only were human beings, but the near companions of the club members and the fair richly-gowned guests.

Dogs walked up and down among the members of the festive company, sat at the table when courses were served, and ate and drank to their heart's content. Then, unlike the human beings present, they lay down and slept while the company closed the feast with toasts, songs and other ancient formalities used on such occasions

THE SUNBEAM.

SUNBEAM. . . MINN

"AN OLD-FASHIONED WINTER."

Those who believe that nature gives various warnings in the fall when the winter is going to be severe, are predicting a strenuous season for snow and ice and low temperature. They say that the wild birds which stay in the north during the winter have unusually thick plumage. The shells of nuts are reported to be heavier than they are when a mild winter is coming, and chestnut burrs are also of the "old-fashioned winter" kind, if these weather prophets are correct. Fur-bearing animals are more warmly clad, according to the same wiseacres, than they are before "open" winters, and the bones of geese make the same prophecy. It is all very interesting, but men who make the study of the weather their life work and bring to bear upon it all of the learning and scientific resources of the age, utterly reject these much trusted warnings. They are certain that there is nothing in the whole theory of animal preparations, conscious or unconscious, for differences in winters. They do not believe that the trees grow more bark or put thicker burrs on nuts because the winter is going to be severe. In fact, the scientific experts who deal with the climate seriously and with infinite pains, in all civilized countries, year after year, are sure that there is no nature sign language which tells the character of the weather months in advance.

According to "revised estimates" by the geological survey, the coal remaining in the United States amounts to some three thousand billion short tons. The figures are inconceivable, but what they signify can be readily understood. In a word, the supply is sufficient to last for more than 7,000 years; presumably, at that, allowing something for present wasteful methods of production. To be sure, something less than one-half of the supply is accessible only with difficulty, according to known methods of extraction. Still, with whatever exceptions the revised estimates give a more hopeful outlook than the public had been led to believe were possible from figures heretofore submitted.

The remarks of President Swain to the students at the opening of Swarthmore college the other day contain much of sound sense. "Do not form the habit in college of spending large sums of money," said Dr. Swain to the freshmen. "When one has learned the value of money and has a large degree of earning power, this matter will usually take care of itself. College students are not, as a rule, large money earners, and are usually spending money earned by others. It is usually a safe rule not to spend much money until you have learned how to earn it."

It will astonish many to learn from government reports that the Indians are increasing in number instead of decreasing, and that they are becoming more self-supporting. This gratifying improvement is laid to the greater facilities afforded for the education of boys and girls in the government schols and in the system of apportioning lands, says the Baltimore American. It is time that some measure of justice were being meted out to the original possessors of the land and efforts made to turn them from roving savages into useful and self-respecting citizens.

A Chicago man, to whom was denied a lease in an apartment because he had children, is suing his landlord under the law which declares landlords may not refuse to rent to families with children. If that law stands the test of a court decision it will surprise some people, says the Milwaukee Wisconsin. While a man with children must have a place to keep them, yet the owner of property should have the right to refuse to rent his property to anyone whom he considers undesirable.

New York physicians are upholding high fees. With rates advanced for medical advice and undertakers restive under low burial rates, it really is much cheaper to keep healthy, cheerful and alive.

"Hot Water Is Cure for Many Ills," says a newspaper Woman's Page headline. It may be, but there are hundreds of people that get into hot water who don't like it.

Now a professor of the University of Chicago says that young children are not primitive little savages, but he will get few except doting parents to accept his theory.

Spain's troubles in Morocco are now exceeded by Spain's troubles at home. King Alfonso is certainly the unhappy ruler of an unhappy land.

South American revolutions amount to so little now that the world only laughs at them.

POLE DATA A FAKE?

TWO MEN SWEAR THEY MADE ALL OF DR. COOK'S RECORDS.

THEN CHEATED OUT OF PAY

Were to Have Received $4,000—Got Only $260 on Account Before Explorer Disappears—Brooklyn Physician in Nervous Collapse.

New York.—The remarkable narratives of two men, made under oath, declaring that they were employed by Dr. Frederick A. Cook to fabricate astronomical and other observations for submission to the University of Copenhagen, which is about to pass upon Dr. Cook's assertion that he discovered the north pole on April 21, 1901, were made public Thursday.

These men are George H. Dunkle, an insurance broker of 31 Nassau street, New York, and Capt. August Wedel Loose, a sea captain of 437 Thirteenth street, Brooklyn.

For their labors they were to have received jointly from Dr. Cook $4,000, with an additional bonus of $500 to Capt. Loose upon the acceptance of the records by the University of Copenhagen. They say that Dr. Cook had paid them only $260 when he disappeared on the eve of the dispatch of his "records" to Copenhagen, two weeks ago, and his failure to pay the sum remaining due them, they freely acknowledge to be their motive for coming forward with the story.

The full narratives of Capt. Loose and Mr. Dunkle constitute one of the fascinating chapters in all the literature of imposture. Capt. Loose frankly expresses his scorn at Dr. Cook, laughs at his ignorance of the simples essentials for accurate observations in the arctic regions and describes at length how working backward from the pole, he calculated observations that would fit in with Dr. Cook's narrative and coached him on the necessary modifications of the latter—as, for example, that he must be sure to record that he rose before 4:15 o'clock on a certain morning, because it was at that hour that a certain star, mentioned in one of Loose's calculations, would be visible. Mr. Dunkle describes the inception of the enterprise; how from the newspapers they gathered that Dr. Cook was in deep water, and inferred that he would be glad to pay for help; how Dunkle got John R. Bradley, Cook's backer, to introduce him; how the subject was led up to delicately and the bargain finally struck and carried out, Henry Wellington Wack, personal lawyer of Dr. Cook, has broken off his relations with the explorer.

Mr. Wack refused Thursday to confirm or deny his withdrawal, but it can be affirmed on competent authority that after a consultation with his partners, Mr. Wack wrote Dr. Cook so long ago as November 30 that he must beg him to seek legal advice elsewhere.

"I have not the remotest idea," said Mr. Wack, "where Dr. Cook is keeping himself or why he persists in seclusion when his presence is vital to his own interests and his friends. I read that he is in Brooklyn, in a sanitarium in Maine, in a Philadelphia asylum, but, personally, I incline to the belief he is abroad.

Copenhagen, Denmark.—Dr. Torp, rector of the University of Copenhagen, Thursday said that the charges published in the New York Times against Dr. Frederick A. Cook are based on pure fiction. Nevertheless, he added, he would accept the offer to examine the documents prepared by Loose and Dunkle, which the Times has agreed to send to Copenhagen.

Walter Lonsdale, secretary of Dr. Cook, who brought the explorer's records to Copenhagen, also declared that the accusations published in New York and London against Dr. Cook were totally unfounded. He said that the papers delivered to the University of Copenhagen contained the original observation made by Dr. Cook during the expedition, without alterations.

Boston.—Dr. Frederick Cook, the explorer, is in a decidedly bad nervous condition, but is not likely to die or to suffer permanent effects from the strain of the last few months.

This statement is made on authority of Dr. T. S. Pitt, superintendent of the Pine Tree sanitarium at Wells, Me., where Dr. Cook is a patient.

Prove "Shooting Up" of Town.

Washington.—Conclusive evidence is said to have been secured by the military court of inquiry into the "shooting up" of Brownsville, Tex., that members of the Twenty-fourth infantry, negroes, who were within the fort, fired on the town at the time their companies were racing through the streets of the Texas town, shooting right and left. This evidence, it is reported, is considered conclusive.

Hogs Bring Record Price.

St. Louis.—The highest recorded price for hogs was exceeded at the National Stock yards when on Thursday a buyer gave $8.65 per 100 pounds for fine specimens. Nothing approaching this price has been known in open market here since 1893.

Nurse Cuts Her Throat.

Belvidere, Ill.—Miss Bernice Skinner, head nurse at the American hospital, committed suicide Friday by cutting her throat. Temporary nsanty was the cause.

CONGRESS TO AID WATERWAYS

PRESIDENT SAYS ACTION WILL BE TAKEN THIS SESSION.

Several Delegations Visit White House and Receive Gratifying Assurances from Taft.

Washington.—President Taft gave assurances that steps of an important character toward the development of a system of waterway improvement in the heart of the country would be taken by the present congress. These assurances were given to delegations which he received at the White House.

Four governors and two ex-governors headed the committee of 500, which had been charged by the New Orleans convention to present to the president resolutions asking for a 14-foot channel for the Mississippi.

Gov. Deneen presented the resolutions and the president replied in part:

"I hope that we are all engaged in a work in which we stand shoulder to shoulder, without respect to a particular locality, and that if you gentlemen who are interested in a particular improvement find that your view may not be entirely met and that your particular project may not be the first one taken up in a substantial way it will not prevent your welcoming a a step by congress that when taken means the embracing of every improvement that ought to commend itself to those who are familiar with congress."

Mr. Taft expressed to the Ohio delegation, who sought his support for a nine-foot channel from Pittsburg to Cairo, regret that his remarks before the rivers and harbors congress had cast a "wet blanket" over the convention, and said that he had only intended to help the gathering along by pointing out the practical method of accomplishing the object desired.

Mr. Taft said he had been assured by members of committees which have such legislation in charge that the whole matter of waterway improvement would receive earnest consideration during the present session.

FREIGHT IS AGAIN MOVING

Committee of St. Paul Merchants Find Conditions in Strike Zone Satisfactory.

St. Paul, Minn.—Fifteen prominent jobbers and manufacturers, constituting a committee of the Jobbers' union, and the manufacturers of St. Paul Tuesday, made a personal inspection of the terminals and transfer stations in and about the Twin city for the purpose of ascertaining for themselves the actual traffic conditions as a result of the switchmen's strike.

After a tour in a private car the committee gave out a statement to the effect that "the freight is being moved in a very satisfactory manner, and although normal conditions do not prevail at all points, a volume of business above normal was being handled at some point. We feel justified therefore in announcing to our customers throughout the entire northwest that they may order goods freely without fear of serious delay."

L. E. Shephard, senior vice-president of the Order of Railway Conductors, who has been in St. Paul for a few days, issued an order to all conductors that they must observe strict neutrality and that they should "act as they did before the strike, no more, no less."

MINE INQUIRY ADJOURNED

Jurors Refuse to Consider Cherry Disaster Case Until Missing Witnesses Appear.

Cherry, Ill.—Inquiry by the coroner's jury into the causes of the St. Paul mine disaster came to an abrupt close Thursday without a verdict being reached or any steps being made to fix the responsibility for the attending loss of life.

Speaking through Juror John Thompson, the jury announced that it would not consider returning a verdict until Alexander Rosenjack and Robert Dean, the missing witnesses, either had been found, or the county officials showed evidences of a genuine desire to find them.

After considerable argument it was agreed to adjourn until December 20 in order to give the Bureau county officials an opportunity to make further search for the missing witnesses.

Thirty-Five Passengers Are Injured.

Indianapolis, Ind.—Thirty-five passengers on a street car were injured, none fatally, and few seriously, when the car was struck by an inbound Pennsylvania passenger train at a street crossing and hurled 30 feet. The car fell on a cement sidewalk and lay across the track, but the engineer stopped his train before hitting it a second time. Most of those hurt were injured in the panic which followed the crash. Windows were broken and the passengers climbed from the overturned car.

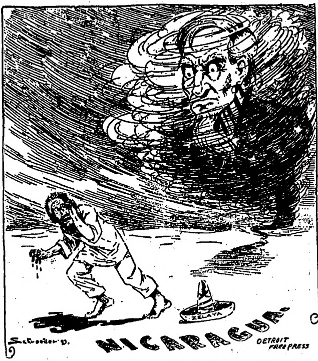
Two Drinks, Then Death.

St. Louis.—Two drinks of beer, the first in his experience, started Russell Howard, a 17-year-old chauffeur, upon a wild "joy ride" that ended in the death of Dennis Short, a pedestrian, Friday.

Names New Mexico Chiefs.

Washington.—The president Friday sent to the senate the names of William J. Mills and William H. Pope, both of New Mexico, to be governor and chief justice respectively of that territory.

THE STORM



BELIEVE 47 LIVES ARE LOST

OFFICIALS FEAR BIG CAR FERRY HAS SUNK.

Boat Carried Crew of Thirty-One Persons—Clarion Sailors Are Reported Drowned.

Detroit, Mich.—All hope that the car ferry No. 2 outlived the wintry gale which has made of Lake Erie a watery graveyard during the last 72 hours was practically abandoned Saturday at the head offices in Walkerville, Ont., of the Marquette and Bessemer Dock and Navigation Company, owners of the ill-fated vessel.

It is believed that Capt. R. R. McLeod of Conneaut, O., and his crew of 31 men have gone down to death with the big steamer.

The ferry left Conneaut, O., Tuesday morning for Port Stanley, Ont., with 30 loaded coal cars, and under ordinary conditions should have arrived at her destination at 3 p. m., the same day. She has not been sighted by other boats.

Cleveland, O.—Hope of rescuing Capt. Thomas Bell and the 12 men of his crew who escaped from the burning steamer Clarion Wednesday night was abandoned here.

Local vesselmen, while admitting that the lifeboat had air chambers and was noncapsizable theoretically, expressed themselves as unable to believe that the sailors could have withstood the long exposure in the icy spray.

Port Arthur, Ont.—Six men employed by the Great Lakes Dredging Company were drowned in the harbor here.

They were on a dredge being towed int othe harbor, when it suddenly sprang a leak and sank. There was a crew of 15 men on the dredge, but nine escapde by jumping on a scow.

Buffalo, N. Y.—Eleven survivors of the flax-laden freighter W. C. Richardson, which foundered just outside the Buffalo breakwater, were brought into port aboard the steamer Paine, which rescued the men and stood by the Richardson for 30 hours.

It is now believed that eight lives were lost. Five are supposed to have gone down with the freighter and the other three are dead or adrift somewhere in the lake in a yawl.

Steamer Burns, Fifteen Lost.

Cleveland, O.—Two men lost their lives and the fate of 13 others, who took to the lifeboat, is in doubt as a result of the burning of the steamer Clarion, near Point Pelee, on Lake Erie, Thursday. Six members of the crew were taken from the Clarion by the steamer L. C. Hanna and brought here. The mate was frozen to death.

Fire Destroys Ohio Town.

Utica, O.—This town of 900 people was practically wiped out by fire and one man, Edward Daum of Lancaster, a guest of the Hotel Vance, was burned to death. Thirty-five other guests of the hotel had a narrow escape and were forced to rush to the sidewalk in their night clothes. The entire business section was destroyed and the loss is placed at $100,000.

Condemns Preserved Eggs.

Peoria, Ill.—Judge J. Otis Humphreys in the federal court here to-day decided that the 50 cases of preserved eggs seized in this city last March by government inspectors were injurious to health and that the seizure was justified. The eggs were shipped by the W. H. Hippolite Egg Company from St. Louis. The firm has been barred from doing business in the state of Illinois.

Liquor Dealers Indicted.

Kansas City, Mo.—Fifty indictments were returned Thursday by the grand jury against wholesale liquor dealers, charging them with violating the new law requiring wholesalers and manufacturers of liquors to pay a graduated tax to the state.

Nurse Cuts Her Throat.

Belvidere, Ill.—Miss Bernice Skinner, head nurse at the American hospital, committed suicide Thursday by cutting her throat. Temporary insanity was the cause.

U. S. NAVY RIVALS GERMANY

Struggle for Second Place in Standing of the Nations Is Very Close.

Washington.—The navy year book for 1909, compiled by Pitman Pulsifer, clerk of the senate committee on naval affairs, shows the race for second place among the navies of the world to be still very close as between the United States and Germany.

Of fighting ships (battleships and armored cruisers) building and provided for, this country has 45 and Germany 46, but the aggregate tonnage for the United States is 659,241, as against 654,334.

Germany, however, has a larger number of small vessels than this country, and her total tonnage is 820,692, against 785,687 for the United States.
